Mr. John Smith was the only son of a Halifax apothecary, who left him at his death, which did not occur until he was past forty, the possessor of an income of five hundred pounds a year. John had been destined (in his cradle) for his father's profession; but nature, in the form of a peculiarly timid and susceptible temperament, raised such objections, that the project had to be abandoned, and trout-fishing in summer, and snipe-shooting in winter, formed the leading occupations of the young man's life, until these sports were interrupted, for a season, by the decease of his respected sire, and the consequent duty of looking into his own affairs. This discharged, Mr. John returned to the snipe and trout with undiminished ardor.

The change in his habits, was, indeed, so slight as to be hardly perceptible. Even the two old servants, husband and wife, who had, from time immemorial to him, formed the domestic establishment. and whom he (John) had, from kindly motives, dismissed, superannuated, with a handsome allowance, insisting that Master John was not getting on nicely without them, came quickly back; dismissed, without the slightest ceremony, the provisional maid; and resumed their accustomed duties with all the vigor of youth!

John Smith has been described, by a gentleman who lived in his immediate neighborhood, as an under-educated but well-mannered little man, with a pug nose, watery eyes, and a funny little flickering smile, which seemed to have been caught from the ripple of the brook over which it had been his delight to hang since boyhood. Take John Smith altogether, body and mind, he was perhaps the very last individual in the world to whom anything romantic or mysterious was likely to attach. And yet John Smith had a romance and a mystery; and (like a queer little parenthesis in the social annals of the world) here we chronicle the same, taking up the history about three years after the death of John's father.

Although Mr. Smith had never been in the habit of giving regular dinner-parties, it was a frequent custom with him to invite two or three of his chief gossips to partake of a brace of Wandle trout, most of which, weight, condition, disposition, and all, were (while yet in their native element) so well known to that experienced fisherman, that it must have been like diminishing the circle of his personal acquaintance to dine upon them. These, with a neck of mutton and any pretty little tiny kickshaw, such as Justice Shallow with commendable judgment delegated to his cook, formed a light and pleasant banquet, which left the intellect clear, and temper sweet, for the rubber of threepenny whist that wound up in the evening.

It was on one of these festive occasions that attention was drawn to the first of a series of remarkable objects which seemed altogether out of keeping with the modest adornments of the Smith mansion. It was a massive silver chalice, of most beautiful workmanship, displaying three compartments, on which were represented scenes from "tauromachia," or classic bull fights. It stood upon a blue velvet-covered pedestal, beneath a glass case, which, while it permitted a full inspection of the masterly devices on its gleaming sides, protected the exquisite object from dust or soil.

"Hallo, Jack, that's a fine thing!" remarked friend number one, suddenly awakening, as it seemed, to the merits of the "thing" to which he had been sitting opposite for half an hour. "I must put on my specs for this. *Mag*nificent, by jingo! Look at it, Gripper. Toro—what? Was this your father's, Jack?"

Mr. Smith colored and hesitated,

"Well, no. My father he didn't seem to care much about them sort of things; but, I say, Gripper, just you try that brown sherry. Join us, Peters, will you?"

"If I were to be guilty of the vulgarity of appraising a man's property at his own table," said Mr. Smith, the curate, "I should be disposed to affirm that the individual who became possessed of that chalice at anything under three hundred and fifty pounds, was a lucky fellow."

"Where upon earth did he get it?" said friend number three to friend number four. "I didn't give our host credit for taste of this kind."

"Aha! There's a mystery, I take, about that chalice," remarked the ungrateful Gripper, who, even while swallowing the brown sherry, intended to silence him, had noticed the embarrassment of the little host. "I must examine more minutely;" and he stretched out his hand towards the cup.

Smith caught him nervously by the sleeve. "Not for worlds, old fellow! Let it alone, can't you?" he gasped; and sank back into his chair with a perceptible shiver. Mr. Slade adroitly turned the conversation.

Several months passed, yet the surprise created by Mr. Smith's purchase had not wholly subsided, when a second and yet more costly object made its appearance in the drawing-room at Allsop-terrace. This time it was a gigantic vase, than which may be seen (especially in Germany) many baths of smaller dimensions. It was composed of about equal quantities of gold and silver, and was, like its predecessor, surrounded with devices of the rarest mould—the subjects, in this case, being suggestive of stirring incidents of the chase, or war. The rich cover was crested with the design of a matador (in solid gold) giving the finishing touch to a white Andalusian bull in a frenzy of silver. It must have been worth, at the very lowest estimate, a thousand guineas.

Mr. Smith was as reticent and as embarrassed as ever, and his friends had to fall back entirely on conjecture.

What in the world did it mean? Could the donor have been some grateful patient of the deceased apothecary? But no; for why conceal what would be so honorable to all the parties concerned? Could it be that a sudden monomaniacal passion for objects of this description had possessed John Smith even to the absorption of full two years' income in a single purchase? Hardly that, for he was sane and shrewd enough in other things. And, besides, how would the timid, nervous little gentleman have been able to summon the courage and decision required to complete such a bargain? The curiosity on the subject grew almost into pain.

"Come now, you know; tell us, old fellow, where these gold and silver mines of yours are situated?" inquired the somewhat rough-mannered Mr. Gripper, adopting that frank tone which, indeed, was fairly his own, but was intended, on this occasion, to invite a corresponding frankness.

"I—I dont know what you mean," replied Mr. Smith, the wan smile flickering in and out of his irresolute face, like a damp wick that will not ignite kindly

"Now, I'll tell you what, my friend," resumed Mr. Gripper, setting his teeth in the truculent manner which always warned his interlocutors that he was going to say something very unpleasant indeed, "I see it all."

Mr. Smith looked disturbed, but it was not the agitation of one whose secret is on the point of being discovered. On the contrary, it was with something that seemed like curiosity, that he ejaculated, with unusual emphasis:

"Then wh—what the devil is it?"

"There's a woman, and a woman with money, you lucky dog, in the case."

"In what case? Where?" gasped Mr. Smith, in sudden terror.

"In love with you, that's all!"

Mr. Smith turned deadly pale. His hair, had its constitution permitted, would have assumed an erect position.

"Heaven forbid! In love with me? What ever have I done? Come, Gripper, you're always ready with your chaff, ain't you, now?" said poor little Smith, almost piteously. "Say you're a-quizzing, now."

"Truth, John, is kindest," replied the inflexible Gripper. "It is my painful duty to arouse you to the fact that you have, wittingly or otherwise (I am not your judge), ensnared the affection of some confiding woman, with a good balance at her banker's, whose homage, in the form of gifts, you, with a baseness of which I should have believed you incapable, do not scruple to accept, intending, all the while, to—to in fact," concluded Mr. Gripper, shortly, "to throw her over."

"Over what? Who? Which? What are you talking about?" stammered poor Smith. "I wish, Gripper, you would not be such a fool!"

"Fool, sir!"

"And don't talk so loud, please," continued the other, looking nervously round. "You don't know who might hear, and perhaps believe your chaff; for it is chaff, now, ain't it? Come, be neighbors, now, and don't let's have no more of this."

"That will wholly depend upon the course I see you adopt," said Mr. Gripper, guardedly. (He was a good-natured man, and loved a joke, but his serious manner, and a gloomy look he had the gift of assuming at pleasure, frequently imposed upon his friends.) "Now, sir, unless you think fit to communicate the whole of this nefarious plot to me, I—I will not answer for what, as a matter of honor and humanity, I may not feel bound to do."

"Plot? Whose plot? Why do you talk to me as if I was a Guy Fawkes?" pleaded poor Smith, in a tone of such distress that Mr Gripper all but abandoned his joke.

"From whence come these magnificent presents? And why, sir, do you color and hesitate when questioned on the matter?" retorted Gripper, sternly. "No one suspects you of having stolen them. As little could you afford to become their purchaser; and where the deuce you came by the judgment to select them, if your funds permitted, is the greatest mystery of all. There is but one solution; that, sir, which I have suggested. As man to man, I demand—yes, demand—an explanation."

Mr. Gripper folded his arms, and called up a frown of extraordinary gloom.

Perhaps he overdid it a little. Perhaps a dim consciousness that Mr. Gripper had no more business with the matter than the Tycoon of Japan, awoke, in the gentle bosom of poor little Smith, the slumbering man. At all events, with an energy he was never known to display before or since, he confronted his scowling friend, and, making the most of the niggard stature meted out to him, boldly replied:

"Then, sir, I refuse; and the sooner you can make it convenient to quit my house the better."

"Quit my house?" echoed Mr. Gripper, dismissing his frown and joke together. "Not till I have shaken hands with one of the heartiest and pluckiest fellows in the whole range of my acquaintance. By Jove, Smith, what a spitfire you are becoming."

"Think so?" said Mr. Smith, rubbing his hands, and at once returning to good humor. "No, no."

"Couldn't you see that I was only chaffing you?" asked his friend; and, shortly after, took his leave, much disgusted at not having been able to discover the secret.

Greater surprises were in store. Mr. Slade, who was rather near-sighted, was entering one evening his friend's always open hall door, when he was startled by a flash of steel and gold, and a tall menacing figure, armed with a glittering lance, seemed to be about to make a target of his breast. Mr. Slade reeled instinctively back against the door, and then perceived that his assailant was only the case of a warrior; being, in fact, a magnificent suit of Milan armor—silken surcoat and all, complete—and which, being placed across a mighty block of wood, in default of a steed, represented a knight in the tilt-yard in act to charge. A diadem encircling the wrought helm, denoted that this costly equipment had enclosed the limbs of some chivalrous prince in ages passed away.

The good curate was still rubbing his eyes, and marvelling at such an object encountered in such a place, when Mr. Smith hustled in.

"Why, Smith, what have you got here? My good friend, this is a treasure indeed!"

"Ah! I thought you'd like my Lazy Sally, and was 'oping you'd look in," replied the virtuoso. "There, you needn't go too close. It looks 'alf as well again at a distance," he added nervonsly.

"Your Lazy Sally!" ejaculated Slade. "Why do you call it so?"

"'Cause that's its name," retorted Mr. Smith. "Look 'ere!" and he pointed to a device and legend on the shield borne by the kingly champion.

Short sighted Mr. Slade put on his glasses, and made out, for device, a hull's head and neck encircled by a broken chain; and, for motto, the well-known words in which the marshal of a tournament gave signal to engage:

"Laissez aller."

"Lazy Sally! I said so," exclaimed the lover of art. "I wish it wasn't quite so big, though. Where ever it's to stand——"

"Why, Smith, you are collecting quite a museum?" remarked the curate. "You will want a custodian shortly."

"Well; I don't think it'll come to that," said Smith." "I shan't outrun the constable."

Mr. Slade laughed, and observed that his friend had slightly mistaken his meaning.

The curate's prophecy seemed likely to come true. Other objects of art continued to arrive at uncertain intervals, until not a room in the house but could boast of at least one rich and beautiful specimen, selected by a taste as pure as the expenditure it must have involved was liberal. Mr. Smith's collection arrived at the value of, at least, fifteen thousand pounds; and it was not unusual for persons in the county, who delighted in such things, to travel considerable distances to visit the accomplished proprietor, and congratulate him on his acquisitions and the refined art-knowledge which dictated their selection. The suit of Milan armour was an especial attraction, and was rendered more interesting by the circumstance that an inscription had been discovered on the breast plate beneath the surcoat. It had, however, been purposely obliterated, and now only conveyed a suspicion that it had been in modern English, without affording any clue to its significance.

Thus matters went on, until the "unmoved Fates," who spare the harmless as little as the oppressor, knocked at the quiet door at Allsop-terrace, and imperatively demand the body of Mr. John Smith.

The pretence was this. One day, towards the closing of the trout-season, when your sworn piscator grows keen and jealous of his diminishing sport, Mr. smith—while in the heat of a life-and-death contest with a four-pound patriarch, whose time (John felt) was more than up—slipped down the bank, and into a deep pool. He was, it is true, rescued by some husband-men and fished up, not only alive, but victorious, still holding to his prize. But the results were serious. The poor little man caught a cold that set its fangs in his delicate chest, and ultimately sucked away his life.

When conscious of his approaching end, he sent for his friend Slade, and requested him to allow himself to be named co executor with their gossip, Tom Gripper, to carry out, among other things, a purpose he had greatly at heart. It need hardly be said that his old friend consented, and, thereupon, John Smith disburdened his mind of a little romance of private life, which may possibly be held not unworthy of a page in these records of the rolling years.

About twelve years before, and about three years subsequent to his father's death, John had a mysterious consignment, which, being opened, revealed that exquisite silver chalice which first attracted his neighbor's curiosity. A card accompanied it, on which, in a beautiful female hand, were written these words:

"J. S. From the deeply greatful and admiring PROLL."

And in plain but unobtrusive characters, below the rim of the chalice, was engraved:

"To the intreped Smith."

Perplexed in the extreme, John carefully laid up the chalice, hoping that the mystery would in some manner elucidate itself and not without fear that he might be suddenly called upon to account for appropriating what was certainly intended for of his by no means uncommon name. And "Proll," who on earth was "Proll?" Was it Proll? Yes. There was no mistake as to the spelling Poll might have been more natural, more familiar. No. Proll it was.

All doubts, however, were dispelled by the alarming receipt of the second present, the vase, accompanied by a note from "Proll," expressing her regret that Mr. Smith's modesty—a quality that always attends true courage—should have deterred him from exhibiting to his friends the former testimony of her gratitude and enthusiastic admiration. "I know you," Proll concluded, "John Smith, of 9, Allsop-terrace, though you know not me. And your Proll, your grateful but invisible protectress, Proll, will I remain until my dying day."

"Whatever I've done for to make anybody so grateful," said poor little Smith, his wan smile wanner than ever, "I can't understand."

Slade could not help him on this point, so to turn the conversation, asked his friend why he had evinced so marked a disinclination to having Proll's gifts closely examined?

John seemed embarrassed for a moment, then he said:

"Well, it don't matter now; so here's the truth. Some of my friends—not you, Slade" (affectionately pressing his hand,) "'ave been in the 'abit of chaffing me 'cause I was a nervous sort of timid chap, and these cups and things of Proll's seemd as if they was a-chaffing too. Every one of them, you see's talking of my conrage, my 'ardihood, and so forth. There's a motter on each. On the vace was written, 'To the brave, devoted Smith.' On the stomach of that harmor, was, 'Trihute to death-defying 'ardihood, in the person of the noble-'arted Smith.' And so 'tis in all of 'em. Somehow, though I couldn't bring myself to believe that Proll was laughing at me in her sleeve, I knew it would set those fellows off, so I scratched ont the writing on the harmor's stomach, and wouldn't let no one look too close at t'other things, you see. Now, what I want you for to do is this," continued the invalid, raising himself on the pillow. "O' course, this is all gammon. Proll must be a lunatic. I never did her any service. How could I, as have lived quiet here, since I was horn? I feel as if I'd been taking money and gimcracks all my life from Proll's family, which may want 'em. There may be old Prolls, or little Prolls, or, in short, my good friend, I have made up my mind to leave a thumping legacy to Proll, at all events, and you must find her out if you can. I know yon will try. And, if you can't," concluded the speaker, faintly, for he was getting wearied with his long speech, "so, that perhaps, somehow, after all, the right J. S. may come in for one of Proll's pretty thingumbohs."

Later the same eveuing, as Slade again sat beside his friend, awaiting the solicitor who was to receive instrctions for the intended legacy, the curate quietly revived the subject of Proll's mysterious gifts.

"You are quite certain—think, now, John—that you have never been in a position to render some extraordinary and timely service to this Proll?"

"Never, on my word," said Mr. Smith, emphatically.

"It is very singular," resumed Mr. Slade, pondering. "Do you know—hut tell me, first, has any event of real importance, such, I mean, as would remain among the best-remembered incidents of an ordinary experience, ever occurred to you, that might, indirectly, perchauce, connect itself with this enigma? Think."

John reflected.

"Except that—in June, 'forty-two—I landed——"

"Yes?" cried his friend, eagerly, observing that he paused. "You landed. How? Where?"

"In the pool, below the weir," replied Mr. Smith, faintly. "I landed him—in twenty minutes—with a single gut—brown partridge fly. He weighed nine pounds and a bounce!"

Mr Slade fell into another reverie. Suddenly he resumed:

"It occurs to me, Smith, as not a little remarkable, that every one of these mysterious offerings contains some reference to an ox."

"A hox!" ejaculated the invalid. "Hox?"

"Or hull. It is an ancient sacrifice, a hull-fight in the arena, or even a crest or device, as in the armor instance. Now that, to my mind, has a decided significance. Did you ever—say, in your reckless youth, my friend—have a misunderstanding with a hull?"

"I!" exchaimed poor Smith. Stay, though. With a hox, I 'ad."

"Ha!" said the curate,, brightening up; "how was that?"

"I was walking quietly dowu Hollow-crosslane, when there come a-hellering he'ind me; and a man rushed past, crying out that a hinfuriated hox had broke ont, and was coming down the lane! I heard him tramping, and ran on; hut there was a quickset hedge on each side, and no gate. So I made a tremenjious leap, and got over."

"And were in safety?"

"Why, no," replied Mr. Smith. "The haggravating beast had previously adopted a similar course, and was in the field before me. I saw his great broad forehead, heard a shriek (hut whether 'twas my own voice or somehody else's, I'm afraid to say,) and, being knocked down insensihle, knew nothing more, till I woke in my own 'ouse, with Hannah hathing my 'ed."

"Then the matter is as unaccountable as ever," remarked the curate, with a disappointed sigh.

The conversation was never renewed, for poor little Smith was beginning to sink, and two short days comprised all that was left of his inoffensive life.

More than scrupulously did the friendly executors endeavor to fulfill the dnty imposed on them; hut their quest of Proll was unsuccessful. They had ceased the hopeless inquiry, and had begun to consult as to the alternative measnre provided by the will, when, one morning, a visitor sent in his card to Mr. Slade.

"Colonel Commerell."

The Colonel, who appeared about forty-five, and whose contenance was bronzed by an Indian sun, was a man of stately presence, and frank, yet gentlemanly manner.

"I am just returned, sir," he said, "from a long period of foreign service, dnring the latter part of which my communications with home have been somewhat irregular. My attention has only now been directed to your advertisement, addressed to 'Proll.'"

"God bless me! are you Proll? exclaimed the curate, starting from his seat.

The colonel laughed.

"Well, no," he replied. "My wife is. At her desire I am here to explain what, judging from the terms of your advertisement, has remained too long a mystery. So poor Mr. Smith is gone? Well Peace to the brave."

"Ehem," said Mr. Slade. "To be sure. Yes."

"It was an act, sir," said the colonel, enthusiastically, "worthy of the brightest age of chivalry."

"You don't say—that is, do you think so?" said Mr. Slade, cantiously.

"Indeed I do. But let me relate, in a few words, what you don't know of this matter."

("You might relate what I do in fewer still," thought Mr. Slade.)

"When I was a jolly young cornet," continued his visitor, "I had the good hap to engage the affections of one who—God be praised!—is still the blessing of my home. She was an only child; heiress, in prospect, of very great wealth. Her father looked to unite her to a member of the noble house with which he was already distantly connected, and, having some suspicion of our attachment, hurried Rosina off, for a time, to the residence of a relative who lived in a sequestered neighborhood three miles from hence. Singularly enough, my regiment was ordered into this very district. Quite as remarkable was it, that my wife's father never knew of that coincidence. So palpable an interposition of fate was not to be neglected. We met as often as possible. Show myself I dared not in the quiet walks of Copfold. So Rosina mounted a rough pony, made over to her by the aunt for excursions beyond the park limits, and flew across to meet me in the willow meadows, near Hollow-cross Farm.

"On one of these occasions she had tied up her pony in the little copse, and was tripping across a field, when she was alarmed by distant shonts, and, turning, found herself within twenty yards of a furious hullock, which had plunged through a gap in the hedge, and was making directly for her. She had given herself up for lost, when a man—a little man, too—with a desperate hound, cleared the hedge, and threw himself between her and the raging animal! That prompt and generous action probably saved her life. She was preserved. So was he! for the farm people were at hand, and Rosina, from behind the hedge, could perceive that, though knocked down her champion was not gored, and was receiving all the assistance his case demanded.

"Well, sir, the interposition of friends reconciled Rosina's father to my suit. We were married, my wife receiving a magnificent dowry. One of the first uses she made of it was to commence that series of grateful offerings, which doubtless reached their destination. The mystery was rendered necessary by my wife's unwillingness to let it be known how indifferently that dear old lady at Copfold had fulfilled the office of her keeper. Hence, she adopted for her name a nursery appellation, which has, you will observe, about as striking a resemblance to the real one, as such pet names usually hear. Poor, gallant Smith! Well, well! The remembrance of such an act of heroism may—modest as he was—have brought with it a certain sense of satisfaction. Yet, had any one whispered so much in her dying ear, he would probably have faltered out: 'Merely my duty.'"

Mr. Slade coughed.

"Courage, colonel, I have heard, is constitutional, and——"

"I don't know about that," returned the colonel. "For my own part, though I have seen a shot or two, and stood my ground no worse, I hope, than others;—if I saw a mad hull preparing to charge, hang me if I shouldn't be inclined to turn tail, provided there was cover at hand!" And the colonel looked as little like a man who would keep his word therein, as he could well look.

"I am at least certain," said Mr. Slade, in a low voice, "that had our departed friend been more fully sensible of the service he had rendered, he would have felt deeply grateful for having been the instrument of so providential a deliverance."

"As meek as he was intrepid, eh?" said Colonel Commerell. "A beautiful combination! And now let me complete my mission. Proll, that is, Mrs. Commerell, positively refuses to hear of 'anything to her advantage,' resulting from Mr. Smith's will, save gratification of knowing that the brave fellow remembered her. Your solicitor, whom I saw on my way hither, favored me with a copy of the codicil. My wife will most gladly co-operate with you in carrying out the admirable object of rewarding deeds of self-devotion. It is a thing we rarely do in England, where duty—no matter to what extreme it be carried—is popularly, though I think erroneously, believed to provide its own reward."

WISDOM is an ocean that has no shore; its prospect is not terminated by an horizon; its center is everywhere and its circumference nowhere.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

MR. MILL AND FEMALE SUFFRAGE.

In an able article on "The Future of Reform," the Westminster Review discusses the celebrated speech of John Stuart Mill on the policy of the admission of women to the electral franchise, delivered in the House of Commons in May last. The Review says:

"In accordance with existing arrangements women are condemned to suffer all the drawbacks which accompany exclusion from a direct interest in public affairs, and are expected to consider that they have nothing to complain of or desire. They are called upon to manage a household with economy, to maintain a high position with dignity, to train the generation of the future during a period when youthful minds are most plastic and the dispositions most easily biassed in the right or the wrong direction, and they are told that their qualifications for discharging all or any of these duties with success, disentitle them for having the slightest personal share in the government of their country. Indirect influence they have, and that they are commended for exercising. They may bribe not only with impunity, but amid the applause of the stern opponents of bribery. Of course they must respect the letter of the law; the law, however, is one which women are peculiarly fitted for breaking in spirit while adhearing to the enactment. They may intrigue on behalf of their husbands, sons, or brothers, not only without reproach, but, if they succeed in their aim, with the certainty of being praised. More than one of our greatest statesmen has been indebted for his chief influence to the devoted conduct of his wife, sister, or mother; yet, though the wife, sister, or mother may be said to do well in securing his advancement and helping to retain him in office, in lightening his labors and securing his renown, none of them is allowed to vote for him at an election. It is supposed that were any of them to possess this privilege she would cease to be a true woman, and would be transformed into a nondescript being for which human speech is too poor to supply an appropriate name."

In regard to the popular objects commonly urged against the measure, the reviewer says:

"Anything more fruitless or petty than the arguments advanced in opposition to Mr. Mill's amendment we have seldom read. They were stated not by one of the privileged jesters who are the scandal of Parliament, but by a member who was specially sent to India to regulate her finances; who is reputed to possess both common sense and political sagacity; who professes to be a true Liberal, and whom we admit to have many titles to our respect. Mr. Laing told the House 'that the simple, straightforward instinct of nine men or women out of ten was opposed to the proposition presented with so much logical force and acumen by the honorable member from Winchester.' If this be admitted, then, according to Mr. Laing, men and women should follow their instincts and act as if they were animals, and not responsible beings. In other words, he would approve of thieft on the ground that to take whatever one fancied and required was a natural instinct. Moreover, he said, without apparently intending to speak nonsense, that 'Nature had drawn a broad line of distintion between the two sexes, and chalked out the career of force and stability of intellect for men, and the career of amiability, tenderness, and grace of woman.' The inference is that by giving a vote once in seven years, or more frequently, for a member of Parliament, a woman oversteps a broad line which Nature has drawn between the sexes, and ceases to tread 'the career of amiability, tenderness, and grace' which Nature has 'chalked out' for her. Perhaps Mr. Laing can prove the degree of injury done to the female character and the culpability of the opposition to the decrees of Nature which follow from some votes given by some women for members of a board of guardians. Has Nature made an exception in the case of the latter? If so, how are we to discover this? If this be demonstrated, what shall we think of the wisdom of Parliament? We can at all events estimate the wisdom of Mr. Laing when, on a measure of social and political justice being urged for his approval, he avers that poets are 'better authorities than logicians or political economists on such a question.' We confess to have been surprised at the largeness of the minority which supported Mr. Mill. When he entered Parliament he was regarded as the solitary champion of the cause. To desire the enfranchisement of women was condemned as one of his crotchets. Sevety-three members of the House of Commons have been found, however, to vote for the change which, two years ago, very few expected to be seriously proposed. It is now evident that its advocacy in Parliament by some one who would venture to brave the ridicule with which novelties are so often met, was chiefly required in order that it should receive a measure of public support. The lesson is a pregnant one. From it we gather a new argument in favor of the scheme of 'Personal Representation' which Mr. Mill has had the honor of propounding in the House of Commons."

TWO IDEAS OF CULTURE.

It was a thing to be expected that Mr. Bright's well-known fling at the friends and preachers of "culture," in which the great Liberal contemptuously referred to it as "a smattering of the two dead languages of Latin and Greek," and proceeded to show how poor a thing it was, and how little good it can do, and how its value had been absurdly overrated,—we say it was a thing to be expected that a tirade of this sort publicly uttered by such a man as Mr. Bright, should provoke a reply of some sort from so eminent an example and champion of true culture as Matthew Arnold. Accordingly, the reply, though late, has come at last in the shape of a masterly lecture on "Culture and its Enemies," delivered from the Poetry Chair at Oxford, and recently published in the Cornhill Magazine. After some introductory remarks, of a rather personal character, in which the names of Mr. Bright, Mr. Frederic Harrison, and the editor of the Daily Telegraph, occur several times, and in which the lecturer declares that he agrees with the Telegraph that "men of culture are not the persons to be entrusted with political power," intimating, however, that this fact is the fault of the community, and of the prevailing characteristics of English civilization—after these preliminaries, he proceeds to enter upon his subject, which he treats in a very thorough and entirely original style. We have space for only a single extract:

"The disparagers of culture make its motive curiosity; sometimes, indeed, they make its motive mere exclusiveness and vanity. The culture which is supposed to plume itself on a smattering of Greek and Latin is a culture which is begotten by nothing so intellectual as curiosity; it is valued either out of sheer vanity and ignorance, or else as an engine of social and class distinction, separating its holder, like a badge or title, from other people who have not got it. No serious man would call this culture, or attach any value to it, as culture, at all. To find the real ground for the very differing estimate which serious people will set upon culture, we must find some motive for culture in the terms of which may lie a real ambiguity; and such a motive the word curiosity gives us. I have before now pointed out that in English we do not, like foreigners, use this word in a good sense as well as in a bad sense: with us the word is always used in a somewhat disapproving sense; a liberal and intelligent eagerness about the things of the mind may be meant by a foreigner when he speaks of curiosity, but with us the word always conveys a certain notion of frivolous and unedifying activity. In the Quarterly Review, some little time ago, was an estimate of the celebrated French critic, Monsieur Sainte Beuve, and a very inadequate estimate it, in my judgment, was; its inadequacy consisting chiefly in this, that in our English way it left out of sight the double sense really involved in the word curiosity, thinking enough was said to stamp Monsieur Sainte Beuve with blame if it was said that he was impelled in his operations as a critic by curiosity, and omitting either to perceive that Monsieur Sainte Beuve himself, and many other people with him, would consider that this was praiseworthy and not blameworthy, or to point out why it is really worthy of blame and not of praise. For as there is a curiosity about intellectual matters which is futile, and merely a disease, so there is certainly a curiosity—a desire for the things of the mind simply for their own sakes and for the pleasure of seeing them as they are—which is, in an intelligent being, natural and laudable. Nay, and the very desire to see things as they are implies a balance and regulation of mind which is the very opposite of the blind and diseased impulse of the mind which is what we mean to blame curiosity.

"Montesquieu says: 'The first motive which ought to impel us to study is the desire to augment the excellence of our nature, and to render an intelligent being yet more intelligent.' This is the true ground to assign for the genuine scientific passion, however manifested, and for culture, viewed simply as fruit of this passion: and it is a worthy ground, though we let the term curiosity stand to describe it. But there is of culture another view, in which not solely the scientific passion, the sheer desire for stopping human error, clearing human confusion, and diminishing the sum of human misery, the noble aspiration to leave the world better and happier than we found it,—motives eminently such as are called social,—come in as part of the grounds of culture, and the main and primary part. Culture is then properly described not as having its origin in the love of perfection; it is a study of perfection. It moves by the force, not merely or primarily of the scientific passion for pure knowledge, but also of the moral and social passion for doing good. As, in the first view of it, we took for its worthy motto Montesquieu's words: 'To render an indelligent being yet more intelligent!' so, in the second view of it, there is no better motto which it can take than these words of Bishop Wilson: 'To make reason and the will of God prevail!' Only, whereas the passion for doing good is apt to be overhasty in determining what reason and the will of God say, because its turn is for acting rather than thinking, and it wants to be beginning to act; and whereas it is apt to take its own conceptions, proceeding from its own state of development and sharing in all the imperfections and immaturities of this, for a basis of action; what distinguishes culture is that it is possessed by the scientific passion, as well as by the passion of doing good; that it has worthy notions of reason, and the will of God, and does not readily suffer its own crude conceptions to substitute themselves for them; and that, knowing that no action or institution can be salutary and stable which are not based on reason and the will of God, it is not so bent on acting and instituting, even with the great aim of diminishing human error and misery ever before its thoughts, but that it can remember that acting and instituting are of little use, unless we know how and what we ought to act and to institute.

"The culture is more interesting and more far-reaching than the other, which is founded solely on the scientific passion for knowing. But it needs times of faith and ardor, times when the intellectual horizon is opening and widening all around us to flourish in. And is not the close and bounded intellectual horizon within which we have long lived and moved now lifting up, and are not new lights finding free passage to shine in upon us? For a long time there was no passage for them to make their way in upon us, and then it was of no use to think of adapting the world's action to them. Where was the hope of making reason and the will of God prevail among people who had a routine which they had christened reason and the will of God, in which they were inextricably bound, and beyond which they had no power of looking? But now the iron force of adhesion to the old routine—social, political, religious—has wonderfully yielded; the iron force of exclusion of all which is new has wonderfully yielded; the danger now is, not that people should obstinately refuse to allow anything but their old routine to pass for reason and the will of God, but either that they should allow some novelty or other to pass for these too easily, or else that they should underrate the importance of them altogether, and think it enough to follow action for its own sake, without troubling themselves to make reason and the will of God prevail in it. Now, then, is the moment for culture to be of service, culture which believes in making reason and the will of God prevail, believes in perfection, is the study and pursuit of perfection, and is no longer debarred, by a rigid invincible exclusion of whatever is new, from getting acceptance for its ideas, simply because they are new."

THE CITY GARDENS.—The moonlight concert which was given at these pleasant gardens on Thursday night was a grand success. The grounds were tastefully illuminated with hundreds of Japanese lanterns, and presented a beautiful appearance. Chris. Andres' band performed a fine programme of musical pieces in excellent style. About three thousand persons were present, a large proportion of the number being ladies, and all who participated are anxious for another similar concert to be given. These gardens are a most pleasant resort both in the day time and in the evening, and are well patronized.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—New attractions are continually being added to this favorite pleasure resort. Large numbers of people daily visit this delightful spot, and amidst the numerous wonders of nature and art by which they find themselves surrounded, forget the troubles and cares of every-day life.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—The Egyptian mummies thousands of years old, which are on exhibition among the many hundreds of curiosities at this establishment excite much interest. The popular lecture on physiology which is delivered every evening at eight o'clock is well worth listening to.

FIRST ANNUAL MEETING OF THE BUILDERS' INSURANCE COMPANY.

A numerous meeting of the above Company was held last evening in the salesroom of Messrs. H. F. Williams & Co., on California street, near Sansome. At eight o'clock the President, Mr. Mooney, called the meeting to order to receive the annual report of the Directors. He explained that the Builders' Insurance Company, though an offspring of the California Building and Loan Society, was a separate Company, with separate capital, cashier, secretary, actuary, and staff of clerks. They occupied the rear portion of the Bank building, enjoyed all the patronage which the Bank could influence, and in one short year had acquired the position of a first-class Insurance Company. There were only two or three of the other fifteen Companies in operation that had a larger business, and he foresaw that in one year from now the Builders' would be at the head of the insurance business of the Pacific Coast. [Cheers.] The President called upon Mr. McKeon, one of the book-keepers, to read the balance sheets, which exhibited the following statement:

BALANCE SHEET.

Receipts.

Total cash received for capital stock		$ 41,791 00
Total net amount received for premiums		130,870 98
Total interest on deposits from California Building and Loan Society		4,390 21
Total received for State tax		3,000 33
Total		$182,252 52

Disbursements.

Paid for fire losses	$32,951 76
Paid for marine losses	1,108 91
Paid for Federal tax	1,206 77
Paid for re-insurance	3,332 76
Paid for brokerage	10,931 86
Paid for salaries	5,568 67
Paid for printing and stationery	4,202 45
Paid for advertising	6,925 65
Paid for donations	2,910 00
Paid for Fourth of July Celebration	1,456 25
Paid for house plates and advertising boards	2,341 87
Paid for sundry petty expenses	830 70
Balance assets in Company's hands	108,481 77	$182,252 52

The assets above named being composed of:

Cash in Bank	$52,814 69
Bank stock	20,000 00
Fixtures and furniture	2,123 96
Buggies and horses, etc	2,262 73
Premiums in course of collection	30,474 97
Stamps	805 42
	$108,481 77

The President called upon the book-keeper to verify the statement. J. W. McKenzie, Notary Public, then administered the oath, which being done, the President announced that from the interest received from the Bank for their deposits and on their capital stock, they were enabled to declare a dividend of two per cent. per month upon the cash paid in by the stockholders, without touching one dollar of the premium fund. On motion, the report was received. Mr. Jordan moved, and Mr. Fishbeck seconded the motion, that the thanks of the meeting be tendered the President and Board of Directors for their careful and successful administration of their trust the past year.—Carried. On motion, the meeting unanimously voted in the old Board of Directors. Mr. Mooney, on behalf of the Board, returned thanks, and promised to double the business of the Builders' Insurance Company the next year. And the meeting adjourned.—Morning Call.

MURPHY, GRANT & CO.—This old established and leading dry goods house invites the attention of buyers, in our advertising columns, to their large and well-assorted stock of new dry goods which they are now offering at greatly reduced rates to the Fall trade.

LAUREL HALL.—One of the handsomest saloons in this city has been opened on Pine street, the next door east of the California Market. The doors, panel-work and counter are all made of that beautiful wood, California Laurel, polished by Boyd. John Duris, the proprietor, has stocked his bar with the finest quality of wines and liquors, which he sells at wholesale and retail.

FINE PHOTOGRAPHS.—Mr. John D. Godeus, of the South Park Gallery, 444½ Third street, is acknowledged to be one of the very best photographic artists in San Francisco. Cabinet pictures, cartes de visite, and life size photographs are executed by him in a style not excelled by any other artist. Mr. Godeus has unusual facilities for executing good pictures of infants.—Evening Dispatch.

THE GROTTO.—This old established saloon, 520 Sacramento street, opposite the What Cheer House, is now under the control of Mr. John Duncan, who is determined to retain for it that popularity for which the "old place" has always been noted. It has recently been renovated and supplied with some of the "choicest spirits" (in the way of Scotch and English ales, wines, liquors, etc.,) in existence. The old patrons of "the Grotto" will find everything as of old, under the proprietorship of Mr. Duncan.

FIVE YEARS IN JAPAN.

BY FORBES MAITLAND.

No. V.

IN my last I promised that I would this week give some account of the Shto religion, but I find that it will be better to defer this until I obtain more full information on the subject. None but those intimately acequainted with the character of the Japanese can appreciate the difficulty of gaining from them any particulars as to their religious belief and rites.

Notwithstanding all that I and others have written of the deep religious feeling of the Japanese, I think there are few people who would be so easily diverted from their present belief and caused to advocate that of European nations. Not only in religion but in all matters of foreign intercourse, what nation has shown so much anxiety to imitate the formerly so much abhored outside barbarian as Japan? Certainly not China which has been in immediate intercourse with foreigners for the last thirty years, or, perhaps, more properly speaking, I might say one hundred, for we have had at intervals communication during that period of time. How much have they advanced in civilization? Not a whit, so far as their manners and customs are concerned. They as a general thing adhere to their original, "gingall," (matchlock,) they still have the same costume both in and out of the Celestial Empire, they consume at this day as much filth in the shape of "chow chow" as they did one thousand years ago. Do we ever meet a Chinaman in a store buying American clothing? Never; or if one does see at long intervals one or two Chinamen clothed in semi-decent apparel, depend upon it, it was purchased from some "old clo" man. How different in all things are the Japanese at the present day—not much over eleven years since the solitary port of Nangasaki was opened to a few privileged Treaty nations, (I except the Dutch on the Island of Desima) after the country's having been hermetically sealed to the outside world, for a period of over three hundred years! In these few years what a marked appearance has been made in Japan, and the Japanese! In Japan I can point out armies (varying in strength from seventy-five to one hundred thousand men) using entirely European arms, clothing and other munitions of war. I will give an instance of this fact: take a Prince that has been heard of, I may say, all over the known world, the Prince of Satsuma! This Prince has a standing army of over one hundrod thousand men, entirely clothed according to the European idea of what is comme il faut, but which at present is far from agreeable to the Japanese in general. A somewhat amusing incident came under my notice a few years ago; a large body of Satsuma's retainers traveling along the Tokaido, en route for Osaeca, a number of foreigners collected at Kanagawa to see them pass. I prefered to have a look at them before they came near where Europeans were likely to be, on purpose, if possible, to catch them off their dignity, (as it had been reported some days previous, they were to be in European costume,) and catch them I did. Every man was carrying his shoes under his arm, while his feet were encased in, to him, the by far more comfortable sandals, while his cross belt, etc., was about as much at sixes and sevens as anything possibly could be. The word was quickly passed along the line that a "Togine" (foreigner) was in sight; a halt was ordered at once, and the command given "Dress feet," the first time, by the way, I ever heard the order given I must say "dressing feet" did not improve the gait, if it did the appearance of the men. As they filed past me, every man seemed cursing the foreigner and wishing him and his shoes at—well, I'll be polite and use Japanese—Jing-o-kn. My friends afterwards informed me that as the army passed Kanagawa they all had on their shoes, cross belts, etc., in fact were in "full fig," but awfully lame (a few kind hearted foreigners accompanied them some five miles along the Tokaido, out of pure devilment. Of course they would not call a halt and "undress feet" so long as a single "Togine" remained in sight.)

The Prince of Satsuma has been one of the most extensive buyers of steamers, he having purchased some six within a period of twelve months, and that at no small cost either. For the steamer Lancefield he paid something like one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, while the smaller steamers varied in price from eighty-five to one hundred thousand dollars. The transferring of the Lancefield will long be remembered in Yokohama. This was the first steamer of any importance purchased by the Japanese: the hoisting of the flag, was, on that account, looked forward to with considerable interest by the foreign residents. I was on board at the time the transfer was made, and it really was too absurd to observe the manner in which the officials examined the different articles, such as beds, (a luxury which, in all probability, they had never seen in their lives before,) lamps, chrystal, and the numerous articles in the steward's department. Each and every article was duly inspected, the parties at the same time not showing the slightest astonishment, intimating, in fact, as well as they could by their looks: "Oh, that's nothing, we have all this;" and in some instances fancied that they considered the goods rather inferior to those of their own manufacture. The hauling down of the English, and the hoisting up of the Japanese flag, was, however, the event of the day, combined with a decided anxiety on the part of the foreigners on board, to see the private flag of the owner. The salute in honor of the hoisting of the Japanese flag is fired, quick as lightning, down comes the English ensign, and the Japanese is run up to the "peak"—all eyes are turned toward the main, to have a look at the private flag—Ah! it has just touched the "truck," and in a second the armorial bearings of the Prince of Satsuma will float over the good ship Lancefield. What is that I hear, a gentle murmur, at first, as if in doubt. The flag floats in the breeze, and a shout arises of what? "My Uncle," for there are the three white balls and the pair of seales, emblazoned on a blue ground, and these are the armorial bearings of the Prince of Satsuma!

INDIAN REFORMATION AND INCORPORATION.

"It was advocated in Congress recently, that the true way to settle our Indian troubles, was to incorporate the different tribes into our own communities and make them useful instead of useless. It is by far the wisest plan yet suggested."—New York Herald, July 23d, 1867.

CHAPTER I.

EFFECT OF TEACHING.

IN pursuance of this plan, several Indian tribes, embracing the Pawnees, Blackfeet, Cheyennes and Apaches, were, in the year 1869, captured by overwhelming numbers and "incorporated" into several philanthropic communities, who believed the Red man to be picturesque and romantic.

Howling Serpent and his tribe, guarded and prevented from stampeding by soldiery, were taken to Muggsville where they were immediately sermonized by the Rev. Ebenezer Puffball, their spiritual guide and general superintendent.

The Rev. Ebenezer Puffball believed in Old Testament wrath for the heathen, and New Testament mercy for the white man. He was one of those stormy divines who must be "worked up" to preach powerfully.

To the Indians he descanted upon the advantages of civilization. He told them how much better they would enjoy this life in trying to live like white men, rather than struggling for a precarious existence on the plains. He talked of the moral influences of stoves, stove pipe hats and the Press. He assured them they would feel much more comfortable in pantaloons, as soon as they learned their proper manipulation, than leggins and breechelouts, and in the most fervid manner did he preach to the squaws of the protection to shrinking virtue afforded by the wearing of hoop skirts, waterfalls and white stockings.

Warming up in this portion of his discourse he frothed at the mouth, stamped a hole through the pulpit floor, and committed an assault and battery on the Bible and Psalm book.

Howling Serpent imagining this to be the white man's war-dance, and partaking of the preacher's excitement, arose in all his native majesty and simplicity, and so howled that all the white sisters, as well as Parson Puffball, fled in dismay.

The soldiers then rushed in and speedily reduced Howling Serpent to a proper condition of civilized religious awe and reverence.

CHAPTER II.

UNSUCCESSFUL INCORPORATION.

The "incorporated" Indians were sent to Sunday school. March Squall, a Cheyenne brave, was "incorporated" in Mr. Cramp's class. Here is the result of his initiatory effort.

"March Squall," said Mr. Cramp, "Who made you?"

"Manitou, the Great Spirit."

Mr. Cramp assured March Squall that he was manifestly in the wrong, and then proceeded to give his own ideas of the author of his origin and creation.

"Humph!" replied the controversial Indian. "White man's God very good for white man. Ingin see Manitou in thunder, lightning, in prairie flower, in sunshine. White man come—take away Ingin's land—take away Ingin's God—take all—Humph!"

"Alas!" groaned Mr. Cramp, "how great the ignorance and perverseness of these Occidental Amelkites." He also found the sentiments of the untutored savage relative to matrimony in a shockingly demoralized condition.

"Have you a wife?" said he.

"Yes, me had two."

"And one is a saint in Heaven, I suppose," said Mr. Cramp.

"No, Winter Wind no dead—her bad woman—keep storm in wigwam all time—March Squall no like—he say you go—bime-by learn better—no want storm all time—want some sunshine—then take Spring Rain."

"And was the change for the better?" inquired Mr. Cramp, who temporarily forgetting the regeneration of the heathen, saw in Mrs. Winter Wind, a prototype of Mrs. Cramp.

"Yes, Spring Rain very good—she thunder little some time—sometime cloudy Humph!—me like that—more sunshine afterward—all sunshine no good."

"Much Squall," said Mr. Cramp, suddenly reverting to his conversional labors, "you must immediately be legally married. It is scandalous for you to go on in this way."

"Tink me love squaw botter when white medicine man say words out of book over me," was the scornful reply of this son of the forest.

Mr. Cramp for a moment wished that no one had ever "said any words" over him and Mrs. Cramp; but he dismised the subject with a sigh, and then made another theological charge upon the Indian.

"March Squall, did you not know that it is very wicked for you to kill your white brothers?"

"Chief, yon hab plenty land—What you call em farm?"

"Yes," said Mr. Cramp.

"Who give you him, farm."

"My father left it to me."

"Chief, my faders left me heap land—plenty deer—plenty buffalo—plenty meat for squaw and pappoose—Bime-by white man come—bring fire water, bible, fire-horse—venisou no more plenty—no more meat—Injun go—go all time. What you tiuk."

To this Mr. Cramp quoted Scripture, and said: "The Lord hath delivered unto us the land of the heathen as an inheritance forever and ever."

CHAPTER III.

HOW THEY WERE MADE USEFUL.

Mrs. Skinflint "incorporated" Willow Waud, one of the squaws iuto her family.

Mrs. Skinflint rejoiced at the prospect of securing help without pecuniary remuneration; but her rejoicing was short.

Willow Wand broke an ordinary month's wages worth of crockery on the first day, and on the second blew up herself and Mrs. Skinflint, by the injudicious handling of a camphene lamp.

Mr. Skinflint took Howling Serpent to help work the farm. Howling Serpent on the third day of his novitiate, discovered a box of matches and a jug of rum. Aided by these artists in the pursuit of amusement and instruction, he fired the barns and haystacks, and contrived to be burned up along with them.

The Rev. Mrs. Ebenezer Puffball had great trouble with her heathen female help. She dressed Morning Star (whom, by the way, she baptized as speedily as possible iuto Mehitabel Puffball,) in hoops, petticoats, pantalets, shoes and stockings.

Evidently this array was distasteful to the aboriginal mind, for she turned her petticoat into a blanket, worn without much regard to civilized propriety and persisting in regarding the hoops as a portable wigwam.

Mr. Stintem took Bloody Knife, Steal Horse and Knock Brains to assist him in cutting wood. Mr. Stintem and the dusky sons of the forest never came home to supper, and search being made, he was found in a few days, very bald indeed, and not long after, the three braves, with three of Mr. Stintem's horses and one package of Mr. Stintem's hair, were captured one hundred and fifty miles distant, by a company of soldiers.

The work of incorporation and making them useful was attended with much anxiety and trouble, which is apt to produce premature baldnesss.

The last distressing casuality attending the work of Indian civilization, emanated from Bloody Bear, an Apache chief, who, being "incorporated" into Mr. Mayday's family, and set to the performance of something useful, was on Thanksgiving day left at home to tend the baby, and guard from overplus of heat, a roasting turkey. The sermon proved a long one. Bloody Bear became hungry. So he ate the turkey, and with a tender regard for the disappointed appetites of the Mayday's, spitted the infant, and substituted it for the departed fowl. Although on their arrival home, it was done to a turn, and Bloody Bear assured them that he was "heap cook" and "Big Injun, me." Yet they were not at all gratified by the change.

After this, Apache dry nurses were at a discount in that neighborhood.

PRENTICE MULFORD.

"OWEN MEREDITH."—Mr. Edward Robert Bulwer-Lytton—has written a volume of poems entitled Chronicles and Characters, which is announced for publication.

Two Hundred Thousand Dollars worth of new Fall Dry Goods to be sold at great bargains. Meagher, Taaffe & Co., having made immense purchases of new Fall Dry Goods at the recent great auction sales of H. M. Newhall & Co., and Voison, Ris & Co., are now selling them at surprisingly low prices at their retail store, No. 9 Montgomery street. The goods consist of French, English and American dry goods, black and colored silks, wool and silk dress goods, shawls, laces, embroideries, and every style of housekeeping goods. For a more particular specification of these goods, see Meagher, Taaffe & Co's. advertisement elsewhere in this paper.

THE ITALIAN RESTAURANT.—This favorite restaurant, No. 515 Merchant street, opposite the Washington Market, has for years past sustained an enviable reputation for the good fare it served for the moderate price of fifty cents per meal. "The Italian" has recently been purchased by Mr. Guiseppe Cabenaso and the public may rely that nothing will remain undone by its new proprietor to sustain its good name and popularity.

A GOOD THING.

I AM ashamed to confess that I have been a thief. It is humiliating to reflect that, at an earlier period of my career, I should nt any time have so far forgotton myself as to have beeu guilty of the vulgar offence of petty lorceny from the person. It is sad to remember, moreover, that, this being my third mistake of that natnre, I was condemned for it to five years' penal servitude. Doubly humiliating it was when after having been liberated on a ticker-of-leave for good conduct, I discovered how many professions were open to me of a far more lucrative character than my former calling, and althongh beyond the reach of the law.

It occured to me that, with a small capital, say fifteen ponnds, I might be ahle in a short time to realise almost an independency for one in my position, by very simple means, and quite honestly—that is to say, when viewed in connection with scme successful husiness oporations in the highest walks of commerce which have come within my notice.

Accordingly, on my release, I went to an acquaintance of mine, a pawnhroker with whom I had formerly done husiness in another way, and stated my intention of turning over a new leaf. I hinted it was possible he might have in his possession a number of valuable articles, such as watches, rings, and so forth, which, for certain reasons, it would he inadvisible to offer for sale; hut for which he might, nevertheless, be glad to find a market. Singular enough, he had. I proffered my services to assist in disposing of these articles, for the very reasonahle commission of five per cent. My overtures being nccepted, I requested my friend to make out pawn-tickets for all the trinkets, priced at their full value, thirty pounds. Having done so, he the entrusted then tickets to my charge, and handed me in advance the commission of thirty shillings.

With a portion of this money I paid for the following advertisement in a daily paper:

£15. WANTED, for ten days, by a professional gentleman. Eight pounds will be paid for the accommodation, and property deposited worth double the amount. Address, etc.

From about twenty replies I seleeted one with a country post-mark, and in female hand writing. After some correspondence with this lady—a lodging-honse keeper in a sea-side town—she was prevailed upon to advance the money on my terms, which were, Itom, my acceptance at ten days for twenty-three pounds. Item, the deposit of the pawn-tickets for thirty ponnds' worth of valuable jewelry.

When the acceptance hecame due, I was unavoidahly called out of town on important husiness, and did not return for some days; in fact, not until the estimable matron, finding the acceptance dishonored, had endeavored to recover her money by redeeming some of the pledges. She had taken out goods to the amount of ten pounds, but considering they were not worth the money, refused to redeem any more. The pawnbroker, however, knew as well as I did that the tickets, being actually in circulation, would he sure to come hack again some day, and to result in his getting rid of the property at a very good profit. This in course of time actually occurred, for the worthy lady on discovering that the goods were pledged for more than they were worth, was quite sharp enough to dispose of the tickets one by one, for a small premium, among her continnally changing constituency of lodgers; hy this means she partially recnperated the amount she had lost, and carried out my truly fraternal principle of sharing our losses as well as our joys and sorrows among our hrethren in the world. Agonising reflection to a well halaneed mind like mine, it cost her four pounds fifteen. I would have made money by it!

During the hours of my retirement from the husy scenes of life (at the expense of my country), I had possessed ample opportunities for reflecting on the inestimahle hlessings of a free press to an enlightened community. I now proceeded to embody the result of those reflections.

I first of all made friends, at some trouble and not a little expense for liquor. with a porter in the employ of Messrs. Danton & Birch, the celebrated auctioneers in Moon street, City, and I ultimately succeeded in prevailing on that porter, for a handsome consideration, to take charge of some letters that would he addressed to me, hut to "his care," at his masters' offices. I impressed upon his mind the necessity of watchfulness, lest any of these letters should miscarry into his employers' hands.

Having thus secured one of the most respectable addresses in Loodon, I next purchased ten pounds' worth of postage stamps, and then sent the subjoined advertisement to three daily newspapers, direeting it to be inserted every other day: three insertions in each paper only:

THE advertiser, being in the enjoyment of a GOOD THING, is willing to impart it to a select number of snbscribers. This is bona fide. Send thirteen postage stamps and a directed envelope to "M.," Esq., care of "H. W.," at Messrs. Danton & Birch, Moon street, City.

This sort of advertisement being rather a stale artifice in itself, I depended for its success, first, on the unimpeachable respectability of the address, and, next, on the manner in which I intended to work it.

At the end of a week, my nine advertisements had brought me one hundred and eighty-four replies. Each reply contained the addressed envelope and thirteen postage stamps and holted, you wrong me—you entirely mistake the chastening influence of meditation and retirement on a just and sensitive mind. What I did was this: In each of the directed envelopes, I folded up the thirteen stamps I had received, together with thirteen more, in a neat piece of paper containing only these words and figures:

See Genesis xlii. 35.

Imagine the surprise and curiosity of my one hundred and eighty-four clients, when, on opening the letter, each found twenty-six stamps returned for the thirteen he had forwarded, and had turned up the quotation, "And it came to pass as they emptied their sacks, behold every man's bundle of money was in his sack."

I stopped my advertisements for a week. Still a few straggling applications dropped in, making the total number of replies two hundred and twenty-seven.

Now, I knew very well that out of my two hundred and twenty-seven constituents, each of whom had received a present of thirteen postage stamps, there would hardly he one who would not apply to me again. In a general way, if a fish take your bait and he not hooked, he will come hack to you. Most of my fish would reason thus: "I cannot lose anythings, for, heing thirteen postage stamps in pocket, I risk nothing by a second venture." But I depended most of all on securing in each of my clients the very hest advertising medium I could desire; for I notice that whereas people who get stupidly swindled, are apt to hold their tongues ahout it, persons successful in matters of doubtful issue are invariably anxious to inform their friends how very shrewd they have been. In a week I resumed my advertisements; three more insertions.

I had not miscalculated the result. No fewer than one hundred and ninety-four applications came from "original shareholders." At the end of ten days the total number of my subscribers amounted to seventeen hundred and forty-eight.

You will guess, perhaps, that I now kept all the stamps. You misjudge me cruelly, and do injustice to the salutary lessons of confinement and contemplation. I returned the stamps of eight hundred of the applicants, with thirteen more enclosed in each envelope, and the same reference to Genesis; taking care to reply to only half the letters from each town. Then I inserted my last advertisement.

THE GOOD THING.—The advertiser requests the indulgence of his correspondents; they are so numerous, it is utterly impossible to reply to all by return. He assures them, however, that each client shall receive due attention in rotation.

In a fortnight I was inundated with letters. They came from all parts of the kingdom. Many of them were stamped with coronets, crests, and monograms, that surprised me, though I had made some proficiency in the study of such devices on spoons, in bygone years. My friend the porter brought the letters to my lodgings every morning and evening, on a pair of hand trucks, until in all I had received twelve thousand four hundred and seventy-one. Then Messrs. Danton & Birch had their attention directed to the fact of their house being used as my address. They surprised their porter in the act of "running" a cargo of my letters; him they discharged; the letters they confiscated. It grieves me to reflect on the melancholy fate of the porter, likewise on the number of postage stamps diverted from their proper channel. It is fair to say, though, that I believe Messrs. Danton & Birch religiously returned every postage stamp that fell into their hands. This is highly satisfactory to a mind, etc. Even I could have done no more.

You will very likely think that I now stopped the correspondence? Not quite correct, even now. Honesty is ever the best policy. First, I took the precaution of removing my letters, my valuable stamps, and my valuable self, into the country. Then, from my rural retreat, I proceeded to impart to my twelve thousand four hundred and seventy one constituents, the grand arcana and mystery of "The Good Thing." Although at a tremendous sacrifice of stamps, I held myself pledged to reply to each correspondent, as an honorable and professional man.

That my privacy might not be disturbed by disagreeable inquiries, I took the precaution to forward my letters twice a week to London in a hale, to my dear friend, the pawnbroker, for the sake of the London post-mark. He posted them for me at the "General."

It took exactly a month to complete my extensive correspondence. No postage stamps were returned this time; but each letter contained the following piece of advice, neatly inscribed on the best baronial cream-laid note (and in my opinion it is a precept more priceful than postage stamps, and should be written in letters of gold):

To inquirers for the Good Thing: See Luke x. 37. Go and do likewise.

With a view to attract into the paths of honesty and virtue those of my misguided brethren still pursuing the highly reprehensible occupation of vulgar robbery, I subjoin my balance-sheet, which cannot fail to prove an incentive to the practice of honest labor for daily bread. In proof of its having taught me the beauties of rectitude, I wish to call attention to one item it contains. I refer to income tax. My retiring and gentle nature could not brook a "return," to undergo the scrutiny of a curious surveyor; but a recent number of the Times contains the following notification: "The Chancellor of the Exchequer begs to acknowledge the receipt of the second half of a Bank of England note for ten pounds, on account of income-tax, from M., Esq." Need I add that M. stands for Me?

I wish to add a general moral.

To steal in the lump from any one person is disreputable and foolish, besides rendering you amenable to the law; but so to conduct your negotiations as to distribute a given loss (your profit) among the largest possible body of constituents, is the true theory of commercial prosperity.

THE CORNUCOPIA OF 1867.—The following from a St. Louis paper affords a pleasant prospective of the condition of the wheat growing country of the great "Northwestern States:"

"The country laughs with an abundant harvest. Throughout the greater part of Illinois, this State and Kansas, the crop already partly harvested has been very large; the promises of the crops not yet gathered in, not only in these States, hut to the northward, is very bright, and from the South and East all reports concur in representing the yield as exceedingly abundant. Famine is no longer feared. Speculators in grain count their losses, and consumers already rejoice in a fall of prices. The country is richer already, and feels it. Some estimate that the crop of 1867 alone would more than half pay the national debt.

It is not merely in the actual increase of wealth, that this bountiful harvest will do good. It will make life easier for all laborers and consumers. To the poorer classes, especially, the abundance of provisions, bringing low prices, will be peculiarly grateful. But this is not all. Agriculture is the basis of all our prosperity. When that fails, everything stagnates. The blood in all the veins and arteries of business flows feebly. With a bountiful harvest it bounds gladly through the pulses, fresh, vigorous, and full of life, the strength returns and activity becomes a necessity.

Millions of dollars have been locked up waiting for this harvest. Business of all kinds has waited. The storm cloud has passed. The sky is clear again, and every one feels that business must now revive. Confidence, the parent of prosperity, returns. The farmer receives a handsome sum, and puts no small part into circulation at once. The money starts machinery that has stood idle; revives trade that had been dormant."

THE BABY.—The small despot asks so little that all nature and reason are on his side. His ignorance is more charming than all knowledge, and his little sins more bewitching than any virtue. All day, between his three and four sleeps, he coos like a pigeon-house, sputters and spurns, and puts on his face of importance; and when he fasts the little Pharisee fails not to sound his trumpet before him. Out of block, thread spools, cards and checkers, he will build his pyramid with the gravity of Palladio. With an acoustic apparatus of whistle and rattle he explores the laws of sound. But chiefly like his senior countrymen, the young American studies new and speedier modes of transportation. Mistrusting the cunning of his small legs, he wishes to ride on the necks and shoulders of all flesh. The small enchanter nothing can withstand—no seniority of age, no gravity of character; unless, aunts, cousins, grandsires, granddames—all fall an easy prey; he conforms to nobody, all conform to him; all caper and make mouths, and babble and chirrup to him. On the strongest shoulders he rides and pulls the hair of laurelled heads.

BEAUTY OF AMERICAN WOMEN.—Taking for a subject the last court reception, as these entertainments might be called, a writer in the Queen offers an opinion regarding the beauty of our women. He says: "Several Americans were presented at his drawing-room, and, of course, by the wife of their minister here. They were very much admired; in fact, I think we are all willing to admit that American ladies indulge in more elaborate dressing than we do, even at court, and, though their beauty is scarcely so durable as that our cold, northern, damp climate bestows on our countrywomen, in early youth it surpasses ours. The presentations by ambassadors and their wives takes precedence of all others; so that the fair strangers from the other side of the Atlantic had the honor of being introduced to royalty before the rest of us."

[The following poem, which appeared in the Bulletin a short time since, is republished at the request of the author, with some additions, and the correction of a large number of typographical errors, which obscured the sense as it first appeared in print.]

TRUANTS.

WHEN days are warm and butterflies are thick,
The frolic urchin, with his switching stick,
Strays from the path to school and loiters time,
Barefooted ranger of the summer clime!
Half-conscious in his heart, the while, of crime.

Leaves, that are in his credence, fairy wove,
The dædal blue sky with star-glories trove,
The spring-born brook, that brawls a liquid song,
Lipping its emerald borders all day long—
With merry babble drowning sense of wrong:

The umber fringe of woodlands cool and dim,
The sotto drone the myriad insects hymn,
In Nature's somnent accents seem to say,
(Indeed, 'tis difficult to answer nay,)
"Come, little one, I give thee holiday!"

The dandelioned meadows tempt his feet;
Where zigzag barricades of stone wall meet
He sprawls his elfish length, in full revolt;
While acrobatic crickets round him vault,
Marauding squirrels chirking, "Welcome!" halt.

And there the rosy rogue content reclines,
Reveling in quaint moods of quiet shines,
With clover-blossoms wild, of white and red,
Such as we deem delight the newly wed,
Making a lawless, but delicious, bed.

Clouds of soft censure fleck the pastime hour;
Perchance a raindrop from a roving shower
Falls on his nut-brown cheek, or balms his feet;
Pearl-largess tendered to a joy complete,
Making, if anything, his fault more sweet.

And near, staid Robin, of the scarlet breast,
Perches a moment, jealous of his nest;
Quirking his gloss-brown tail with knowing leer,
(There always is a tattler where we fear,)
The while he plaintive pipes, "Here, here! Here, here!"

Justice, oft slow, yet sure, anon will rise,
Flashing the nomad's slumber with stern eyes;
But, ah! the picture in so fit a frame,
Making of anger an admiring flame,
Quells the dire glance and wiles the tongue from blame.

And well it may. Are we not truants all?
Respondents to delusion's graceless call,
Trampers in crooked by-paths from the road,
(The proverb myth, the jewel-headed toad,)
Where Duty waits us with incumbent load?

Ay, very truants all high-class and low:
Heads with love-locks, and heads as white as snow;
Yet does the Master gently welcome back,
His ample garments lending to their lack,
Necessitous rebels to the loyal track.

Lessons are often hard, temptations great;
The foul side sometimes seems the fair of fate,
And so we err, and then with meek excuse,
A plausible and ever ready ruse,
Return, sad vagrants, flaunting flags of truce.

If He, whose rule is golden, spares the child
Of mature growth, by evil gild beguiled
From paths of irksome duty, need we fear,
Even though the trepassers to us are dear,
If we with trespasses are not severe?

Ah, no! be merciful, ye who are weak;
Rogues of a subtler age may well bespeak
The kindly grace they hope for when they band,
Beseeching mercy with uplifted hand,
Shame-faced at last around the Master's stand.

Precepts that fade in practice bud in creed;
Slips of exotic thought, flowers of rare seed
Climb in walled gardens, fall in open fields;
For elemental freedom conflict yields,
Where wind, and storm, and sunshine, toss their shields.

Sweet are the tasks of Charity; her sense,
Coined from the wealth that cancels all offence,
Ensaints the palms that are in pity spread,
(And all are wanderers but the reverend dead,)
For Love's large sake above the truant's head.

Time's hours are all school hours; pupils astray
Meet us at every turn without dismay,
Far from the pleasant door where Goodness waits,
Hoping for the return of Truth's lost mates,
Even to the folding of the sunset gates.

Lo, while our feet are in the brambled path,
Be we not monitors in guise of wrath;
But locking hands with stumblers, humbly trace
Our backward way to where the Patient Face
Watches and waits for all the ribald race.

September, 1867. W. A. KENDALL.

IT cannot be too deeply impressed on the mind that application is the price to be paid for mental acquisitions, and that it is absurd to expect them without it as to hope for a harvest where we had not sown the seed.

MAN is placed in this world as a spectator; when he is tired of wondering at all the novelties about him, and not till then, does he desire to be made acquainted with the causes that created these wonders.

"THE CALIFORNIAN" AT TOMALES BAY.

A Brief Prelude—An Invitation and its Results—The Departure—Arrival at Tomales Bay—An Excursion—Toasts and Speeches—A Dance—Tomales and Vicinity—A Word to the City Laborer, etc., etc.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE "CALIFORNIAN."]

BOHEMIAN PALACE, SEPT. 1867.

AS the bee surfeited with honeyed pleasures, culled from the sweet heart of floral treasures, so I find myself flitting about the pretty little town of Tomales, on Tomales Bay, Marin county. As we are proof invulnerable to the Damascus blade-like assaults of critics, we will bear up under the honors of being called a poet for the "transcendant beauty" of style in which we here commenced this letter. We trust there is no encroachment, however, on Bro. Ridge's special poetical forte in his treatment of woodpecker poetry, on which domain he laments our young California poet, Mr. Stoddard, should have made dangerous inroads. But this is not the time or place for gossip. Business is the order of the day. The question is, What brought us here. Let us tell the story, in its simple glory.

AN INVITATION AND ITS RESULTS.

By special invitation of our esteemed friend, J. H. Kincaid, Esq., of the California, Oregon and Mexico Steamship Company, we were one added to a party of guests invited on board the splendid iron screw steamer Gussie Telfair, Captain Joseph Williams, bound on an "initial trip" to Tomales Bay, between which point and San Francisco, the steamer will hereafter run as a semi-weekly line.

THE DEPARTURE.

On the afternoon of the 3d instant, previous to our departure, a very gay and festive party assembled in the cabin of the steamship, as she lay moored at the foot of Folsom street wharf. There were present Messrs. Holladay and Brenham, the energetic agents of the C. O. & M. Steamship Company, Capt. Johnson of the Del Norte, Capt. Connor of the Idaho, Capt. Thorn of the Oriflame, Messrs. Fay and Bryant, chief engineers of the company's line. We "weighed anchor and put out to sea."

ARRIVAL AT TOMALES BAY.

On the morning of the 4th, we lay calmly riding at anchor in the picturesque bay of Tomales, and were boarded by about 300 ladies and gentlemen from Tomales and vicinity. We had a decidedly merry time on board, and at the hour of 1 o'clock the entire party sat down to a sumptious dinner. This over we took a steam round the bay and returned at 5 o'clock. Then followed many toasts and speeches. The first toast—"The Gussie Telfair"—was responded to, in a happy style, by Warren Dutton, Esq., of Tomales. The usual toasts of "The Ladies," "The Press," "Stars and Stripes," etc., followed. These having been duly honored the party returned to shore, highly pleased with the days' festivities.

The citizens having invited Capt. Williams and his San Francisco guests to a dance at the American hotel at Tomales, the party visited the town in the evening, and were most hospitably entertained.

THE TOWN AND VICINITY.

Tomales is about fifty miles up the coast from San Francisco, and is cosily located at the head of Tomales Bay. It is the principal seaport of Marin County, contains about 300 inhabitants, and is surrounded by a very fine grazing and agricultural country. It contains a Catholic church, school houses, two good hotels, the one already mentioned and the Continental, owned by Messrs. Ethier and Clouette. The shipments from this point are large; three immense storehouses have been built, owned respectively by Messrs. Keyes, Dutton and Brady. The county is rich enough to support a paper in Tomales. A readable little weekly, the Marin County Journal, is now published at San Rafael.

A WORD TO THE CITY LABORER.

In and about this vicinity there are very many Irish farmers, and not a few merchants, who present a marked and improved contrast to the great majority of their countrymen who persist in living in crowded cities. These farmers are mostly wealthy, and have every comfort about them that their hearts can crave. They have lands and houses and cattle, and do not have to run to the store for every pound of butter, quart of milk or loaf of bread they use. Their homes look comfortable and happy, and there is an Americanized air about themselves and their surroundings that one cannot but consider a vast improvement upon the custom of renting tenements and living from hand to mouth as must, in a majority of cases, necessarily be the case with the laborer in cities. Indeed, there seems to be too great a tendency among all classes of our people to seek the unwholesome and exciting career of a city life for the healthy, calm and beautiful quiet of the country. DR. ADONIS.

A CHILD is never happy from having his own way. Decide for him, and he has but one thing to do; put him to please himself, and he is troubled with everything and satisfied with nothing.

USE not evasions when called upon to do a good thing, nor excuses when you are reproached for doing a bad one.

A CHAPTER OF HUMOR.

THE NEW CHESTERFIELD.

BY JOHN QUILL.

[He writeth a letter to his son, and giveth him instruction in the art of good behavior.]

MY DEAR SON: You have by this time arrived at that period in your life when you will have to enter into good society, and it is advisable that you should have some instruction in regard to the customs of the social world, and of the duties that you will be required to perform.

You are just of that age when clumsiness will be your most striking peculiarity. Your feet will be much out of proportion to your body, and your general configuration will bear some resemblance to an old yellow pine clothespin. To dance with a lady under these circumstances would be madness, for in all probability you will plant an acre or so of boot leather on her dress, and rip out some gathers, while she rips out a lot of subdued profanity; or you will flatten out a number of her toes, or run her against the piano and cause her to think you are about as graceful as a jointed doll, which you ain't, my son, for you put me more in mind of a long-legged pointer pup cavorting around on the grass, than any other member of the brute creation I know of.

As you can't dance without letting your legs fly around against the looking-glasses and things, your finest chance will be to assume the character of a wall flower, and stand up against the partition all the evening. Of course you will feel miserable, but that's what you go there for. Your hands will feel about the size of a palm leaf fan. If you do not know what to do with them, it will be well to twiddle your thumbs until you can think of something.

Of course you will imagine everybody is looking at you, and you will begin to perspire freely, and grow red in the face as if your shirt collar was too tight for you. But no matter how utterly wretched you feel you've got to keep up a feeble smile, and if you can lay your hands on any other miserable young man like yourself you can talk together and pretend you are enjoying yourself intensely.

If any imprudent person asks you to sing, positively refuse, especially if the master of the house had a grandfather who worked in a saw-mill. He will probably think you are trying to insult him by imitating a cross-cut saw for the amusement of the company. Besides, you will observe the minute you begin to sing, everybody will begin to talk louder, to avoid enduring any unnecessary agony.

When you are introduced to a girl you will, of course, be scared half to death, and for the next five minutes you will be as silent as the grave, for you won't know what to say, and you will feel that you would cheerfully make any sacrifice of fortune, of life, or future prospects, for a chance to get away from that girl.

But you have got to talk to her, my child, and after standing there a while like some slab-sided cigar store Indian, it will propably flash through your mind to observe that the weather is fine, or the company pleasant this evening. Or you will ask her does she skate, or is she fond of dancing, or whether her pa lets her go to the theatre.

Go in heavy on these things, my son. Originality is such a rare gift, that when a beneficent Heaven gives it to us, we ought to exercise it sumptiously.

When you go to supper always help the ladies first, and when they are supplied, pile a plate so full that six ordinary women could live on it for a week, and then go around as if you thought they were not all helped. You can then manifest regretful surprise, after which you, of course, go into a corner where you will have a soft thing to yourself.

If you happen to be with a girl, and it seems to you that you would like to impress her favorably, you will, of course, get a plate of ice cream for her, and then while you are walking toward her with about as much grace as a crippled straddle-bug, if you can get some fellow to jog your elbow and sluice the cream over the girl's silk dress, you can calculate on arousing a deep passion in her bosom.

You've only got to get one of your brogans tangled among her hoops then and rip out about nine yards of wire-work, and you've got the thing all in your own hands to a certain extent.

If you are asked out to dinner, do not try to eat asparagus like a gun swallowing a ramrod, and if you must eat your mashed potatoes with your knife, don't try to create the impression that you are a sword swallower by profession, or that your efforts are directed to performing a surgical operation on your palate; and don't put the cold slaw into your mouth as if you were in the country, and were throwing hay into a hay mow.

If you have on a white cravat, and anybody mistakes you for a clergyman, and asks you to say grace, don't be frightened and go wandering off among the ten commandments, and don't forget yourself so far as to begin reciting poetry.

And just so when you undertake to relate an anecdote, it will make everybody unhappy with disappointment if you forget what the point was and how it ended.

And so, my boy, I send you out into the world. If you do feel as miserable and about as intelligent at first as an oyster on the half-shell, go in and do your best, and you will come out right in the end.—Philadelphia Sunday Transcript.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO,.....SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1867.

A PHILISTINE COMMUNITY.

WE believe that Mr. Carlisle was the first English writer who applied the term "Philistines" to a certain description of people, in a sense similar to that in which it has, we know not for how long, been a favorite epithet with German students. In the student vocabulary—its meaning appears to have been a little vague, and it was often applied to unacademical persons who were for almost any cause offensive or uncongenial from a university point of view. Mr. Carlyle uses the epithet sometimes as applicable to people of an intensely utilitarian turn of mind, having little sympathy with culture, except in its directly practical bearings, and at others he applied it to the class of characters compounded of stolidity pomposity and conceit, with pride of wealth as an additional element, so happily typified by Dickens in "Mr. Podsnap." Quite recently, Matthew Arnold has undertaken a most precise description of what constitutes a "Philistine." The people who believe most in riches, "and who give their lives and thoughts to becoming rich," he says, "are just the very people whom we call the Philistines." And he adds: "Never did people believe anything more firmly, than nine Englishmen out of ten at the present day believe that our being so very rich," which sounds like a general charge of Philistinism against the whole nation. But he goes further on than this, and declares that were it not for "the purging effect wrought upon our minds by culture," teaching us not only to say, but to perceive and feel that wealth "is only machinery," the whole world, "the future as well as the present would inevitably belong to the Philistines." Regarded in this light, there is a strong tendency toward Philistinism in every wealthy and industrial community, and most certainly San Francisco furnishes no exception to the rule. Nowhere are material interests more dominant, nowhere are wealth and success more reverenced. Nowhere does a coarser and grosser ideal of life and its supreme ends, and of what constitutes happiness, prevail. As a community, we do not believe in culture, or love it for its own sake. We respect it if it pays, or if it helps in a practical career, in the struggle for office or power, but for itself, not at all. Certainly our industrialism, our devotion to the practical, is excessive and exaggerated. Professor Whitney's labors in the Geological Survey disappointed us, because they had been conducted in the spirit of a savant, and with an eye to the advancement of science. We wanted him to tell us how to find gold mines and districts of coal, whereas he concerned himself mainly with the larger aspect and theories of geology. Fewer books are bought by our people, in proportion to the population than in almost any of the Eastern States. We have given very poor encouragement to our artists, and though lavish in our expenditure for upholstery and furniture, grudge the price of a picture. Men who never haggle about the price of their wines or their cigars, will beat down their children's music teacher, and go without a new book about which they are curious, unless they can borrow it. Popular, and widely known as "Mark Twain" is, his book met with a very small sale here. Mr. Stoddard's poems, will not, we fear, do even as well. California has reason to be proud of him, says the New York Weekly Review, but we suspect that California would be a great deal prouder of a mammoth squash, or a prize pig, than of a genuine poet. Poetry does not pay, and to the Californian mind the thing that doesn't pay is necessarily a very poor thing. Things in California are good and great in proportion as they pay. The pecuniary standard is decisive. Gentlemen do not hesitate a moment to pay three dollars per bottle for a choice champagne, grumble because two dollars or two and a half is charged for a new book. Upon the whole, we are inclined to the opinion that the people of San Francisco will have to be classed with the "Philistines," if Matthew Arnold's description of the genus is accepted as authoritative.

PRENTICE MULFORD.—This afternoon, Prentice Mulford, whose writings in this paper have been generally admired, both here and in the Atlantic States, will leave for Stockton to assume the editorial duties of the daily Gazette. Mr. Mulfrod will continue to contribute to THE CALIFORNIAN.

PROGRAMME JOURNALS.—Mr. Paul F. Nicholson, of the N. Y. World, is about to start a new programme journal, called the Season. We understand that a theatrical paper, to be conducted in a strictly impartial manner, will be published in this city in a course of a week or two.

THE PACIFC MUSICAL GAZETTE.

THE September number of this valuable periodical duly made its appearance at the beginning of the month. This issue does not contain so much original matter as did the numbers preceding it, there having been but few important musical events during the month of August. The production of L'Africaine and the capital performance of the Harmonic Society (Die Barden,) are duly chronicled. Concerning the opera of L'Africaine, the editor makes the following remarks:

"As to the music of the opera, we approach the subject with many misgivings We had. long before its production in San Francisco, read the pæns in which one school of art critics lauded its beauties, and the adverse criticisms of another class who could only see in the work another proof of that 'artistic bankruptcy' which its composer is said to have already foreshadowed in some portions of his former compositions. That there are few melodies in the opera likely to catch the popular, or even the cultivated ear is very true; neither can the conscientious critic insist that the various combinations of tones in the harmony are to be commended. The bewildering transitions of keys; the abrupt changes of the tempi; the effects sought to be produced by chords which irresistably remind us of Wagner, may, when the 'music of the future' becomes a recognized fact be appreciated; but, at present, they can no more be enjoyed than can the reading of a book whose author sets at defiance the recognized rules of grammar. While, however, we are not insensible to these defects, we are very far from believing that the opera does not contain much music which is very beautiful and very characteristic. Much less are we of those who believe that its success is more attributable to artificial causes than to its intrinsic merits us a musical work. No amount of puffing and indiscriminate praise could have secured the success with which it met in Europe and the Eastern States, and one unfailing test of its general excellence is that the more familiar we become with the music, the more we appreciate its many beauties."

AN INCIDENT OF THE WAR.

DURING the first months of the late rebellion, when regiment after regiment was hurried forward to Washington in order to render the Capital secure, and prevent Beauregard's advance beyond the lines of Manassas, the officers thereof considered a gay uniform as necessary as a camp kettle. They knew nothing of the hardships of a campaign, or what they would have to endure before the war was over. Gold lace, sword and sash, high boots and spurs, and white gloves, were the first consideration. Blankets and a supply of flannel shirts only secondary. So attached were they to the "pomp and circumstance of glorious war," that many were supposed to sleep in their finery, rather than part with it for a moment.

A Massachusetts regiment had joined the army of the Potomac, it was full in numbers, and gloried in a Colonel, who, while leading the life of a civilian, had been the pride and admiration of the fair sex in the villiage in which he had resided. He was rather vain of his personal appearance, and went to the wars, satisfied that in the end he would rival Ney, "the bravest of the brave," in deeds of valor, and Murat in the brilliancy of attire. The uniform as prescribed by army regulations he appeared in constantly, and his pride was to keep it as free from dust and dirt as possible.

Sometime after joining the army, this regiment was ordered for duty on the picket line, and the Colonel felt proud of the honorable position his command was assigned to; he was ambitious and zealous, and went the rounds in person to see that his men were on the alert, and that not a "reb." was allowed within the range of his Springfield muskets. He was a smokist, and on one occasion had stopped at a picket-firo to light his pipe; he was on his knees picking up a coal to drop into the bowl of his favorite meerchaum, when he felt a sharp stab in his rear. Dropping his pipe, he exclaimed in the most piteous terms, "Oh, Lord! don't shove that bayonet into me; spare my life and I'll surrender," and looking over his shoulder, expecting to see the burly form of one of Stonewall Jackson's men, he found, much to his delight, that he had only been sitting on the rowel of one of his elegant spurs.

THE Round Table has entered upon its sixth volume, and has every indication of having attained an unequivocal success. During the earlier stage of its existence it evinced a taste for the sensational, an arrogance of tone, and a superciliousness in its criticism that seemed to us by no means attractive. But during the last year, the paper has undergone a very great change in its whole character, and it is to-day the best weekly paper in the United States.

MRS. EMILIE LAWSON.—The steamer which leaves our shores on Monday next, will bear away California's most gifted poetess—not, we trust forever; we may hope for her return. Mrs. Emilie Lawson's genius has won a wide-spread recognition from the Press of California and the Eastern States. Many of her best poems originally appeared in this paper. Kind wishes will go with her, and many will lament even the temporary absence of so dear and esteemed a friend.

THE "Haley Tract," opposite the South San Francisco Homestead property, has been sold for $120,000 to a Homestead Association.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

DAN BRYANT, the Irish comedian, commenced an engagement at Maguire's Opera House on Monday. The engagement of Mr. Bryant to arrive just when he did, displays much judgment and skill in catering to the taste of the public on the part of the management of the Opera House. I have seldom seen a better pleased audience than that, which, on Monday night, thronged Maguire's Opera House. The public had had enough of tragedy for a while, and Irish comedy was just the thing to suit their taste. The pieces played on the opening night were The Irish Emigrant and Handy Andy. Mr. Bryant became a favorite at once, and every time he opened his mouth was greeted with roars of laughter. I cannot say that this actor possesses as rich a brogue as some other Irish comedians who have visited these shores, neither is his humor so hearty; but it is certain that he has captivated the public of San Francisco. Night after night the house has been crowded, and the new star bids fair to achieve as decided a success as did the last. This afternoon the capital comedy of London Assurance will be performed. The entertainment this evening will consist of Handy Andy and Born to Good Luck. On Monday, Dan Bryant will drop his fooling and appear in the character of the bold "Shamus O'Brien," in the play of that name which was lately successfully produced in the Eastern States.

The production of True to the Core proved a profitable speculation to the management of the Metropolitan Theatre, and its success has encouraged them to attempt extraordinary things. For many weeks past all the resources of the establishment have been called into action to prepare for the grand scenic spectacular play of Azael the Prodigal. The chief members of the Italian Opera chorus have been engaged to assist in the musical portion of the play; new scenery has been painted and extraordinary stage effects arranged. A great feature will be a procession of a hundred persons, representing the passage of a caravan across the desert. Horses, goats, camels and other animals will be introduced. There is a little difficulty about the camels at present, arising from the fact that there is as deadly an enmity existing between the horse and the camel, as there is between the Irishman and the Chinaman. The horse hates the camel because, as he declares, he works much cheaper than any respectable horse can afford to do, and when a horse is brought in contact with the camel, he shricks at him and tries to bite and kick him. It is hoped, however, that it is possible to procure enlightened and liberal-minded horses who will consent to walk in procession with camels. From all I can learn, the production of Azael will be quite an event in the history of the spectacular drama in San Francisco. This afternoon, True to the Core will be played, and again in the evening.

TOUCHSTONE.

ITALIAN OPERA.

ONE by one our singing birds are leaving us, and each successive departure makes it more improbable that we shall have another season of Italian Opera at present. Mme. Stella Bonheur, the favorito contralto, will sail for New York on the 30th inst., and her numerous friends have tendered her a complimentary farewell benefit, which is announced to take place on Wednesday evening next, at the American Theatre. The opera will be La Figlia del Reggimento, in which Mme. Bonheur will assume the fascinating role of "Maria," supported by Signor Mancusi as "Sulpizio," Signor Morley as "Tonio," and Mrs. Hall, M. Roucovieri, M. Hennecart, in other parts, with a full chorus and orchestra. Prof. Evans will act as conductor. This is the last opportunity to hear an artist who, with comparatively little experience, has sustained some characters in a style never before equalled here, and has proved herself both vigorous and graceful, impassioned and correct. A brilliant future lies before her; and a host of friends will assemble to wish her farewell on Wednesday evening.

THERE ARE THOSE who believe that no good thing can come out of "Dixie;" to such, if they are house keepers, we would most earnestly recommend an examination of the Dixie Cookery Book, for sale at Romans. It is a far better book of the kind than either Miss Beecher's or Mrs. Hall's, and furnishes many valuable hints to those upon whom devolves the charge of responsibility of a family menage.

BY many, the defeat of the Republicans in this State will probably be regarded as an evidence or indication of a change in the balance of political power. We may, therefore, very naturally look for a transfer of allegiance on the part of many ambitious politicans, who have no other aim than political success, and who naturally desire to connect their fortunes with the predominant party.

THE last number of Every Saturday announces that "Mr. Dickens is about to start for the United States, where it is believed he will give readings from his works."

THE CITY GUARD'S EXCURSION FOR TARGET PRACTICE.

HOW refreshing it is to be able to leave the city for a day, especially, when, with a pleasant company, you drop business, and the cares attendant thereon, and have nothing more to think of than how to reap the greatest amount of enjoyment between daylight and dark. The ordinary "picnic" is all very well in its way, but give me a party where all ought to, even if they do not, know each other; where there is a head that provides everything necessary, and where no "roughs" are tolerated. Then you can "sail in" with perfect freedom, and take a hand in every thing that goes on, and you feel almost as if every one present was an old acquaintance.

MY INVITATION.

The City Guard (Guard bless them) taking into consideration my youth and extreme innocence, and knowing my fondness for a free lunch, very politely sent me a very large envelope, containing a very large card printed in three colors by Turnbull & Smith, ("in a style that other printers vainly try to imitate,") bearing an invitation to join them on an excursion to Encinal Park, in order to witness how they could riddle a pine board with musket balls, and to observe their style of dancing. I was also informed that the boat would leave at 9:30 A. M., sharp, with these there was a ferry ticket, and a piece of red ribbon, and I was informed by a number of gilt letters thereon, (also printed by T. & S.) that I was expected to decorate myself with the latter while on the ground. It also said "guest," so I "guessed" from that, that all my expenses from 9:30 A. M., until about 6 P. M., would be borne by the "Guard," of which company I hope some day or another to be elected an honorary member, and thus be entitled to go on all their excursions (except in cases of riot or to repel an invasion of the State,) and that without being required to carry a musket or buckle on a sword. The invitation was all right, except that car tickets to and from the place of embarcation were not provided, but as I had no time to correct this error, I passed it over, and "accepted with much pleasure"

THE START.

Provided with four bits, to use in case of emergency, and two car tickets, I started for the Alameda boat at a few minutes past eight, wishing to be early on the wharf in order to observe who my companions for the day were to be. I was about the first I believe, and had to wait at least half an hour before another "guest" appeared; but time did not hang heavily on my hands, for leaning against a wharf post, I enjoyed viewing the unpacking of several express wagons that contained much of the good things intended for our "lunch." From the quantity, I judged that two ferry boats would be required to convey the party, but was mistaken, for I found that other appetites were not as moderate as my own, and before the day was over, concluded that another waggon load would not have been amiss, for some of the guests were "dreadful hungry," and managed to get seated at the first table.

In a little time the company began to arrive; every city car discharged its load, many came on foot, and some came in carriages; there were lots of young and pretty girls, and some ditto widows, that I strongly suspect now of having a much greater interest in the City Guard than mere desire to witness the shooting of its members, or to partake of its hospitalities. But they were unknown to me; I had seen some of them before, but there was not a sun shade that I could claim acquaintance with. I felt alone, and began to be low spirited, until the familiar face of a prominent lawyer appeared in view, and then I was all right, for I knew that he never joined an affair of that kind unless some fun came of it before the day was over. I rushed to him, and exclaimed that I was delighted to see him, and asked the reason of his presence. and he replied that "the Courts have adjourned ont of respect to the memory of the late Senator McDougal, and I have come because I could not find a better way to pass the day." I knew then that I was safe, that if I only followed where he was sure to lead, I was certain of acquaintances enough among the gentler sex, for he knows them all, and would be certain to introduce me.

Punctual to the hour named, the sound of a full military band was heard in the distance, and in a few minutes "the Guard" entered the gateway of the wharf, and marched on board the boat. I stood and looked at them as they passed; fine looking chaps they were, and the only one appearing at all ferocious was the Second Lieutenant, he had rather a wilder expression of eye than the rest of the company; but I was assured that he was quite peaceable, and not apt to be dangerous on a picnic. After they were on board and halted, and the command "rest" had been given, I passed down the front of the line (I'm very fond of soldiers) to inspect. Suddenly I felt myself grasped by the neck and held in a very uncomfortable position; instantly the thought struck me that martial law had been proclaimed on the lower deck of that boat, and that the soldiers were being instructed "how to do it" in case of being detailed for duty with the Provost Marshal. I knew that a non-commissioned officer had me, for I could get a glance at his elbow, and see the three stripes of a Seargent, and I then succeeded in getting my left hand in my pocket, and presenting my card of invitation, ferry ticket and badge over my right shoulder, I was released at once with only the remark of "how are you, glad to see you, where's your wife?" After shaking myself I discovered that I had been grabbed by an old friend, that his grip was one of affection, and joy at seeing me forming one of the party. I had not recognized him as he came on board by reason of never having seen him in his war paint and feathers before; I shook hands, congratulated him on his fine personal appearance, and left for the upper deck where all the ladies were assembled.

OVER THE BAY.

As soon as we had taken our departure, I looked round for some one to talk to, and it was not long before I managed to be introduced to a laughing-eyed, chatty little body, who went right off into ecstacies over the pleasures of the excursion, and who thought that if the world was only composed of opera, balls, picnics and dry goods stores, living to the age of Methuselah would be enchanting; and singular to relate, her sister, a demure looking person, fully coincided with her. My new acquaintance was very jolly—she laughed at every thing worth being laughed at; went through San Francisco from North Beach to the Mission in a few moments; discussed the opera from Stella Bonheur down to the ballet girls; told me all about the churches, particularly the one over which Doctor Stone presides; gave me an account of the prevailing fashions, and expressed her fondness for them, and wound up by saying that a polka or a gallop was her weakness. She didn't give me a chance to get a word in edgeways, or afford her sister the opportunity of saying how she liked the weather. She talked about everything but scandal, and, wonderful to relate, didn't say a word against any one, and I took a liking to her for that reason, and concluded she would make some good fellow a mighty good little wife. I had no chance to talk to any one else on the trip over, and I did not want to. I was amused and interested with acquaintance number one, and was willing to "let well enough alone."

TO THE PARK.

From the boat to the cars took but a few moments, and the latter were able to contain the party without much crowding. The ride from the end of the wharf to Encinal Park I cannot say much for; it possesses only one advantage that I am aware of, and that is its length—it is delightfully short. If the atmosphere had not been so very hazy, the view across the bay would have been beautiful, and I would willingly have stayed there half an hour to admire; but nothing but water could be seen on one side, and piles of lumber, sand, and an indefinite amount of trees on the other, so I didn't care to wait, and was glad to pass on to our journey's end.

THE PARK.

I am glad to know that it is a park, but why it is, I am at a loss to understand. There are plenty of oak trees, lots of underbrush, and sand enough to make a very respectable shoal in the deepest part of the bay, and it appears to be fenced in, but that is all; remove the fence and it would answer well for a portion of a wilderness. True, there was a platform for dancing; a place that looked like a dilapidated corn crib, for musicians; and a few very rough concerns called tables, spread about, but beyound these attractions I do not know a more dreary looking spot than Encinal Park.

THE PICNIC.

A walk of a few hundred yards from the cars through the sand, brought us to the dancing platform, and of course the dancing at once commenced, the Guard having been marched off somewhere to shoot at a mark. To say anything about the dancing would be nonsense, especially as I don't dance; it will be sufficient to mention the fact that it was kept up with all the spirit usual on such occasions. I have watched men, who say they enjoy dancing, whirling about in a Polka, holding up some gushing young damsel, who likes to be held up, and at the same time lays her head on your shoulder, with eyes starting out of their heads, and months half open as if gasping for breath, with the perspiration streaming down their faces, and yet they say 'tis glorious, fudge! stuff and nonsense! it can't be, or if it is I can't see it. My little acquaintance was given to dancing, and I was obliged to hand her over to some fellow that had the same weakness, and I was again alone, but only for a few minutes, for I was introduced to a young widow, and as she preferred to divide the time, and give some of it to looking on, there was a chance to discuss the surroundings, and reader we discussed them; there was much to be seen about that time, and we saw it all, we did not allow a chance to escape our notice. The second dance was a Quadrille, and the widow deserted me, and now comes the portion of the picnic that "riles" my temper. On rejoining acquaintance number one I was saluted with the very embarrassing question of "Mr.—, are you married?" Here was a home thrust, and I parried it by saying, "why do you ask?" the reply was this: "because I have been told that you are, and that I was very foolish to receive attention from one who has a wife at home." It was no use denying it; I had to own up, and the way I did "catch it" during the balance of the day was a caution. I suppose there were twenty indignant but smiling females who threatened to tell my wife; they expressed an intention of calling upon her expressly for the purpose, but I found that if I offered my arm to any of them, especially among those who appeared the most indignant at my daring to talk to a young lady, it was invariably accepted. It is my intention on all future occasions when I may go on an excursion alone, to put a placard on my back with the following in large letters "MARRIED! Hands off!" This will prevent mistakes, and deprive the young men who consider themselves "out and injured," of the opportunity of rushing around to point out who are bachelors and who are benedicts.

THE LUNCH

Was more than enough for those who were expected to be present, but the crowd became so unexpectedly large, that the third table chaps didn't have much boned turkey or chicken salad. However, all did well, and the commissary of the company is entitled to very great credit for his skillful management. Tubs of iced claret punch, and kegs of lager were lying around loose, and a demijohn of Rye could be found by any one who happened to be "taken bad." The caterer did well, very well; his name I learn is Thomas Hyer; he is, I imagine, one of Charles Sumner and Thad. Stevens particular friends, and I am convinced that had Gorham been elected the other day, his chances of being Purveyor General of the State would have been far better than they are at present. Thomas is a favorite name of mine, and Thomas the caterer, stands higher in my estimation than he did before that lunch, and if he will only recollect next time to put covers over the dishes when the wind blows fresh, it will be better for the contents thereof, and the lobster salad will be less gritty than it was last Saturday.

TARGET PRACTICE.

I don't see it, for as I said before, the troops were moved some distance away from the main body of the company. The firing was heard, of course, and it sounded as if our skirmishers were thrown out and had begun to feel the enemy's line. I would suggest to the Guard, however, that next time the target practice should be considered the most important feature of the day, and an opportunity given for all the guests to witness the interesting performance.

PRESENTING THE PRIZES

Was a very pretty and interesting sight. The Guard was drawn up on one side of the platform, the other three being occupied by the guests. As the winning members' name was called he stepped to the front and received his reward. The presentation of the leather medal was made by W. H. L. Barnes, Esq., and he did it in a most touching and affecting manner. He hoped the winner would reach the grade of Major General, a rank that his fine shooting on that day justly entitled him to, and that when the decoration was worn, it would be on that portion of his person most likely to be hit, should he ever be engaged with an enemy. (?) (Much sobbing followed these remarks, and the speaker was much affected.) The reply of the recipient was very proper and very appropriate; he had appreciated leather from his childhood. His first recollections were of leather, as applied to his person by an angry father, and he could not but think of it kindly, and would never cease to value the highly ornamented piece he had that day received as a reward for his inability to hit the side of a barn, at fifty yards distance, as the weather was very hazey!

A very handsome hat was afterwards presented by the Guard, to the Bay City Base Ball Club, for having defeated some other club in a match that was played during the day!

HOME AGAIN.

Thus ended the operations of the day, and we were soon on board the cars and thence to the boat, and at 6 o'clock P. M., were safe along side the wharf at Frisco. I had a jolly time, and so had all the party. Indeed I never passed a more delightful day, and am under many obligations to the company whose guest I was, for the kindness and attention shown me on the occasion.

A SUGGESTION.

I take the liberty of suggesting to the Guard, that at their next annual excursion, they change from Encinal Park to the vicinity of Saucelito. (I own no property at the latter place or any where else that I wish to bring into notice.) The last named spot possesses every advantage; it is good for shooting, dancing or flirting; there is no dust or sand; and there is plenty of shade, and superb scenery. It is, without doubt, one of the most beautiful places about this vicinity, and the only wonder is, that it is not better known, and more highly appreciated. I speak knowingly; I have been there, and if the Guard will invite me, and provide car tickets, I will go again and show them all about the grounds. There, now, with such an inducement before their eyes, they will doubtless take my advice and me, too. So I look forward to next year with more than ordinary pleasure. GOPHER.

INVECTIVE and personality prove nothing, on either side, but a lamentable want of good taste and good argument.

"INDIAN REFORMATION AND INCORPORATION."—A sketch with this title, by Prentice Mulford, appears on the fifth page.

BLUSHING.

THE practice of blnshing is, most unquestionably, an especially disagreeable operation. Sneezing and coughing are really not more involuntary, and yet no particular stigma ever attaches itself to either of these acts. A man may cough without making himself in the least uncomfortable or ridiculous by so doing, or attracting to himself any undue share of the unfavorable notice of those about him ; so long, of course, as he is not creating an inopportune disturbance at a concert, or irritating the over-susceptible nerves of his fellow-worshipers in the congregation. But blushing, even under the most favorable circumstances, must be painful to at least one person. Even to the mere looker-on it is a humiliating spectacle ; and though it must be admitted that there exist people sufficiently malicious to enjoy the prospect of their neighbor's discomfiture, the general feeling is one of compassion for the sufferer, flavored with a slight dash of contempt for his weakness.

The aim of polite education is to develop an impassivity of the North American Indian type combined with a certain cast-iron inexpressiveness of feature. The idea of the perfectly well-bred man is one who never betrays emotion, who receives the intelligence of good or evil fortune with the same imperturbably complacent smile and well-feigned indifference, who never appears surprised at any event, however unexpected. The typical Frenchman—and the character is more or less a foreign conception—may be expected to rise to the occasion by turning off a neat epigram which will probably secure for him a lasting reputation for philosophy at the cost of a few paltry thousands of francs or the desertion of his wife. M. Dumas has succeeded in evolving out of the depths of his moral consciousness a series of impossibilities of the Athos, Monte Christo, and Morcerf type, all agreeing in this one characteristic of superhuman coolness. They do his imaginative powers infinite credit ; especially when we consider under what disadvantages he must have written through lack of proper models.

These fictitious characters are naturally very popular, inasmuch as they gratify that inherent vanity of his readers which leads them to believe in the objective existence of Frenchmen, combining at once politeness and courage in their highest development ; with the addition of all the graces of an Apollo, and the correctest possible taste in dress (not forgetting the small feet and the bottes vernies). When we conjoin to this very respectable list of attributes, which, indeed, quite puts in the shade the somewhat antiquated definition of animal rationale, if it does not even run counter to that exception the crowning glories of perfect irresistibility with the fair sex, and a happy genius for dramatic situation, we have a faint notion of M. Dumas' ordinary novel hero. But even a man of this sort, with the best possible set of nerves, may have a weak point. It is not recorded that the Count of Monte Christo blushed—yes ! actually blushed—when under the influence of any tremendous emotion ? It was the one touch of nature which betrayed his kinship to ordinary mortals, and his biographer does not attempt to conceal the amiable weakness : or, rather, "Is not quite a god." But it is not every one who can afford to exhibit this sign of emotion without losing caste.

"The man that blushes is not quite a brute,"

Blushing is unanimously voted by fashionable people to be a mark of rusticity. It is supposed to be an evidence of awkwardness, shyness, and a general rawness, and is, therefore, not esteemed. This is rather unfortunate for those defectively organized beings who have a natural trick of blushing without the extenuating circumstances under which the renowned Count sinned. They suffer from an aggravated consciousness that not only are they doing wrong, but, further, they are physically unable to avoid a relapse into trasgression. This is very annoying. Indeed, the utter state of moral collapse which accompanies a protracted fit of blushing is, we are told, so intolerable as even to drive the afflicted person to the extremity described metaphorically as the desire to sink into his shoes ; and such a longing for self-extinction can only be the result of a complete disorganization both of the moral and nervous systems.

The disfavor with which blushing is beheld, is rapidly producing its effects in abolishing the disease. No young person of either sex thinks it at all becoming to exhibit the delicate pink suffusion of blood about which enthusiasts, such as poets and painters, rave so absurdly. It is natural, and looks modest ; but what of that ? One is supposed to have left all that sort of thing behind in the nursery. Young men of the present day, if indeed, there exits such a class, seem to acquire by a process of immediate intuition, unknown to their fathers, all the experience and aplomb of long-continued acquaintance with society. In fact, everybody believes himself at premature age a complete man of the world. He possesses miraculous cigars ; affects to be an infallible critic in all matters ; frequents a tailor who knows how to dress him in the most fashionable garments. It would be ridiculous in him to simulate any false modesty. He discards, once for all, the mischievous practice of blushing, with all the other degrading badges of a state of pupilage. But, on the whole, very old-young people cannot be reckoned among the successes of modern times. A misconception that modesty is incompatible with manliness prevails.

The fact is that shamefacedness is becoming perceptibly rarer. Its culture is so entirely neglected that we begin to despair of finding another specimen of the boy of ingenuous countenance and ingenuous modesty. He is, as the Americans have it, considerably played out ; and is fast receeding into that region of pleasing fictions already tenanted by the Dodo, the Sea-Serpent, and other mythical and historical existences. A similar advance may be recorded as having taken place among girls. Not but that among those just "out" we may frequently be refreshed with the sight of the tender miss of the good old traditional type, lavish of her smiles and blushes ; but a season or two soon destroys all this freshness, and her diffidence very rapidly melts away before the fire of adoration.

There is nothing that counteracts this constitutional tendency to bashfulness in woman like the consciousness that their smiles are the object of the eager aspirations of a body of numerous admirers. It is not often, indeed, that much encouragement of this sort is needed. The imagination of most young ladies is generally fertile enough to conjure up a goodly array of hypothetical swains to supplement the ranks of their real devotees. The woman who does not believe in her power of charming, or in the existence of a decent proportion of victims to her beaux yeux, may congratulate herself on the unique position she holds in society, but had better make a secret of her disbelief unless she wishes to run the risk of being esteemed a poor creature by both men and women alike.

When once a man has become aware of the fact that he has risen into some kind of importance, be it ever so slight, his timidity, as a rule, will vanish, unless it be of a very deep-rooted nature. And even in this case judicious management will do wonders for him. A few terms at the university, or a few months in society, have been found exceedingly efficacious in converting ordinarily shy men into exquisites of the first water ; the contact of the world has either brought to light a latent quality of effrontery which, under less happy circumstances, might have laid dormant for years, or it has led to the adoption of a polite mask of impudence to conceal the otherwise distressingly obvious sheepishness of the original nature.

Not even the most unlikely subject need, therefore, despair of a glorious future, in which he may acquire distinction to himself for well bred assurance. And, indeed, in these days of false busts, false hair, and other shams, in which there appears to be absolutely no limit to the Protean power of transforming the body, it may be reasonably supposed that the improvements in science will, before long, disclose a means to force the growth of any mental quality which may be found desirable or fashionable, although the means adopted to that end may not be precisely the same ill-fated apparatus by which Mr. Midshipman Easy's father fell a victim to his scientific zeal.

PECULIARITIES OF LANGUAGES.—In all hot countries men use, in speaking, a multitude of vowels, which are all pronounced by greater or lesser apertions of the mouth, in breathing and in speaking, and use very few consonants, all of which are produced by more or less complete interruption of the breath, and contact, or even closure of parts, among the organs of speech. Any one who examines the Italian language, will find, therefore, about sixty vowels in every hundred letters ; and in the Otaheitean (Tahitian) language, which sounds very like Italian, there are even more ; it is said about seventy-five or eighty vowels in every hundred letters. The proportion is very different in English, in which consonats predominate ; and if we examine the language of Lapland or Greenland, or of Arctic-American Esquimaux, we shall find that there are an enormous number of consonants in their more than sesquipedalian words, and that most of these are guttural, as they do not like to open their mouths to the cold air sufficiently to pronounce the labial, dental, or lingual consonants, much less the vowels, and least of all the more open of the vowels. This is a universal law ; though immigration or colonization, or the ancient transplantation of a whole nation by a tyrant conqueror may sometimes present an apparent exception or anomaly, by our finding a language or a people, originally temperate or torrid, in a frigid zone, or vice versa.

ANCIENT CHINA.—A resurrection of some Oriental literature is very humiliating to our western and nineteenth century pride in showing how far the Chinese had gone in civilization when Europe was barbarian and America unknown. They were burning coal before the Christian era ; they were printing A. D. 581 with black, and lithographing three centuries later ; yet another century, and they were using movable types of terra cotta. Porcelain, water-tight compartments in ships, portraits for catching criminals—all these were known to them in those days. And it even appears that 919 years before Christ these Celestials used leather greenbacks ! The Chinese had also the tradition of the Madonna and child. This symbol was the Tien-How, the queen of Heaven, represented as nursing her infant son, who holds a lotus bud in his hand, as a symbol of the new birth. There is a model of this group in porcelain in the ethnological museum of Copenhagen.

ST. PETERSBURG AND ITS PEOPLE.

I AM free to confess that the "Newski Prospekt," though one of the least striking, is to me one of the most interesting thoroughfares I have ever strolled about. The crowd which passes up and down it all day long is so unlike any other crowd one can see elsewhere. Ladies dressed in the richest sables, with mantles that even to inexperienced eyes convey an impression of immense value may be seen crossing the pavement to the shops, followed by Chasseurs or Heidukes, decked out with gilt braid and feathers and stripes, till they look, at the very least, like field-marshals in mufti. Side by side with them are troops of Russian peasants, all clad in the long grey sheepskins hanging down to their heels, and tied tightly round their waists. In many parts of the world you see dirty people. London can furnish no unworthy contribution to the great anti-soap-and-water league ; but there is a dirt about these Russian peasants not known in the western world. In those sheepskin coats the peasants live night and day. Till the garments fall to pieces, they never dream of any change. Nor are the faces of these men like European faces ; their foreheads are broad and low, their cheek-bones stick out, their eyes are sunken, their noses flattened, with wide, open nostrils, their mouths large, and their complexion of a yellow hue not common in the west. But, in spite of their filth and squalor, they are a not unhealthy looking race of men. What they do in the "Newski Prospekt" I have not been able to clearly ascertain. To all outward appearance, they loaf about with no particular design, staring languidly. You will see them sitting for hours on the steps of houses or at street corners, doing nothing.

The common women, in St. Petersburg at any rate, have more or less got rid of any particular costume, and resemble the women of any ordinary German town, except that they wear such masses of shawls and petticoats as to give them the air of walking bundles. In the midst of the crowd, from time to time, you meet Cossacks or Tartars dressed in strange embroidered jackets, with arms by their side, and the butts of pistols protruding from their belts. The gray coated Russian soldiers meet you at every turn. Beggars of the regular hermit type solicit alms with an air of vested right. Apple-stalls stand on the pavement in front of the handsomest shops ; and the vendors call out the names of their wares in unknown tongues, with a shrill pertinacity which would do honor to Clare market. Add to this that the pavement is crowded with a motley gathering of all nations. Half the resident population of the city is said to be of foreign origin ; and certainly, as you walk along, you hear the strangest Babel of many languages. Meanwhile the center of the street is even more crowded than the footways. It is immensely broad. In the middle there runs a street railroad, along which American cars keep passing constantly. On either side there is a strip of wood pavement, over which the droshkis race at the top of their speed ; and between the wood pavement and the curb there is a sort of chaussée of round rough stones. The ground has sunk here as it does everywhere in St. Petersburg ; and wood work, stone work, and iron work alike have been trampled into ups and downs. Indeed, of all the villainously ill-paved cities it has been my lot to traverse with pain and peril, St. Petersburg is by far the worst. Berlin is bad, but then no Prussian driver ever goes above a gentle trot, whereas in Russia they drive as hard as they can tear. Everybody for himself and God for us all seems to be the motto of the Muscovite coachmen. You are driving along as fast as you well can, you hear a rattle behind you as if a fire engine were coming, your droshki swerves on one side with a shock which all but throws you off the seat, and a calèche with an officer in uniform seated in it comes thundering past. It is apparently in its normal state—a one-horse droshki with a head to it, but on either side the horse within the shafts there are one or more horses fastened simply by traces. Lashed along at full speed, with the outside horses at an angle of some forty-five degrees to the pole, the caleche is very like the car of Phaeton in mythological pictures—curious to look at from the pavement, but not pleasant to have dash by you within an inch of your wheels. To-day, while driving about, it appeared as if every staff officer in the city—and one person in twelve well-nigh seems to be at least a general—were amusing himself by galloping about the town in wild huntsman fashion. At the Winter Palace there were any number of imperial, royal, grand ducal, and princely personages ; and everybody, who was anybody, was engaged in paying his respects to some one or more of the illustrious visitors. The day, unfortunately, was one of pelting, pitiless rain, so that the Royal strangers who had arrived for the first time at St. Petersburgh must have had a dismal impression of the Muscovite capital.—A Month in Russia during the Marriage of the Czarevitch.

THE errors of the good are often very difficult to eradicate, from being founded on mistaken views of duty.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplisbment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from iguorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

"I'VE GOT 'EM, TOO."

Two whiskey-drinking friends who had been on a prolonged spree, wandered into a livery stable, the other night, and were allowed by the man in charge, who knew them, to lie down in a bed in the office to sleep off the fumes of accumulated alcohol. Now it happened that there was a young puppy under the bed, in a basket covered up with a blanket. Suddenly one of the men woke up and heard a succession of smothered barks coming from some direction, he knew not where. Waking up his companion, he said: "Jim, do yon hear that dog barking?" Jim didn't, of course, because the dog had stopped barking. He listened, and hearing nothing, told his friend it was but his fancy—there was no dog barking—he had better go to sleep again. "Didn't yon hear the dog, though?" urged the other, growing suddenly excited, the sweat starting out of him. "No, you fool," said the other. "Then, Jim, I have got the tremens!" he exclaimed, and attempted to leap out of bed. But Jim clung to him, and finally, by soothing conversation, prevailed upon him to lie still, and after a little the frightened bummer went to sleep. Jim didn't, however. He was wakeful from nervous reaction, and the gnawings of a remorseful conscience which a man feels when he is coming out of a debauch. Suddenly the puppy under the bed begnn to bark again. It was a low, muffled sonnd, that seemed to come from the air, and then there was something so mysterions and weird in it that Jim, who sat bolt upright in bed, shivering in every fibre. He listened with straining ears and protruding eyeballs, and when he caught the sound once more,

—'that stretched his father on a bloody bier,'

("That's what the matter, the bloody beer,") he clutched his sleeping compauion with frantic energy, and shook him until his teeth rattled, and shrieked, "I've got 'em too, Bill; I've got 'em." "Got what, Jim?" "TREMENS!" The hostlers were alarmed, and came running in, when an explanation ensued, and the puppy who had caused so great agitation was found. Jim and Bill got sober at length, and they havn't been on a spree since.

TO EPICURES.—There is considerable difference between a gourmand and a gourmet. In the gourmand the animal nature predominates, while the gourmet cultivates the sense of taste until it is rendered susceptible of receiving the highest gratification. The gourmand is satisfied to swill flat beer or sour wine, to eat ill-cooked viands, provided he can get enough to gorge himself withal. Epicures, or gourmets, who can appreciate the delicate bouquet of a fine wine as they delight in the perfume of the violet, should pay a visit to the store of F. C. Belden, No. 612 Sacramento street, where they will find the rarest brands of wines, spirits and liqueurs, the choicest teas and an immense assortment of delicacies, such as truffles, pate de fois gras, Stilton cheese, caviare. etc.

AYER'S

AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevers, indeed for the whole class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

WATCHING THE STARS.

Quite an amusing incident took place some time ago, in a town about three miles and a half east from here, towards the rising sun. It appears that a young man had been paying some attention to a young lady, but had only ventured home as far as the gate till last week, when, carried away with the excitement, he ventured to step aside, after being assured by the fair damsel that all would be right. Having for a while quite anxiously waited for the first star to shoot, the old gentleman of the establishment stepped into the parlor, and looked over his spectacles at the surprised couple, but before any questions were asked, the fair young lady spoke up and said:

"Pa, we are waiting to see the stars shoot."

"Yes, you are, hey? well, go to bed, and I'll sit up with this young man; when the stars shoot, I'll tell you," replied the interesting parent, casting a side glance at the feller.

The young man sat a while quietly, without speaking, when he got up and looking out of the window, remarked' "he did't think the stars would shoot after all, and guessed he'd go." The young man says he shan't very soon forget watching for stars to shoot, and most of all he was afraid of, after the gal went to bed, that the darned things wouldn't shoot.

GRAND TRIAL

....OF....

SEWING MACHINES.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE

FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE

WILLCOX & GIBBS

TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

THE BENCH AND BAR.

The new book, "The Bench and Bar," tells the following good story of Senator Wade and the late Mr. Giddings as opponents at the bar:

In the early part of his practice Wade was defending a man against an action of slander, and after having concluded a very effective speech to the jury, sat awkwardly leaning backward, his feet on the counsel table, and facing Giddings, who was attempting to be eloquent in behalf of his slandered client. "Old Gid.," familiarly called, knew a little smattering of Shakspeare, and now determined to bring that great author to his aid.

"Gentlemen of the jury," said he, with much ardor,

"He that steals my purse, steals trash;
But he that robs me of my good name—"
"[Ahem!"]

At this point, to his great discomfiture, Shakspeare deserted him. He repeated,

"But he that robs me of my good name—"
[Another pause.]

"Takes that I never had," whispered, Wade, as if prompting him, and so distinctly as to be heard all in the room.

Amid the laughter and his confusion, Giddings brought his speech to such a "lame and impotent conclusion" that his client recovered but six and a quarter cents for his lost character.

Kate hates moustaches; "so much hair
Makes every man look like a bear."
But Fanny, who no thought can fetter,
Blurts out, "The more like bears the better;
Because"—her pretty shoulders shrugging—
"Bears are such glorious chaps for hugging."

"You would be pretty indeed," said a gentleman, patronizingly, to a young lady, "if your eyes were a little larger." "My eyes may be very small, sir, but such people as you don't fill them.

In the matter of the Guardianship of the person and estate of WILLIAM CHARLES HOLLINSEAD, Minor.

On reading and filing the petition of Jeremiah V. Hollinsead, Guardian of the person and Estate of William Charles Hollinsead, Minor, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that said lot constitutes the entire estate of the said Minor, and that there is no personal estate, or money with which to provide for the maintenance and education of the said Minor, or to pay taxes and street assessments levied upon said real estate hereafter, and that it is for the best interest of the estate of the said Minor, that the said real estate should be sold.

It is ordered, That the next of kin of the said Minor, and all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court, at the Court room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on Monday, the 16th day of September, A. D., 1867, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Jeremiah V. Hollinsead to sell the interest of the said Minor in the said real estate described in the petition, at private sale for the purpose of the maintenance and education of the said Minor.

And it is further ordered, that a copy of the foregoing order be published once a week for four weeks, in the CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper published in the city and county aforesaid. M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Dated August 9th, A. D. 1867.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of Theodore L. Schell, the administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of William MacMichael, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the legatees of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said William MacMichael, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on WEDNESDAY, the 9th day of October, Anno Domini 1867, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to shew cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the legatees of the said William MacMichael, according to law.

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said ninth day of October, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

GOD BLESS THE MEN.

God bless the men!
We say amen!
Who buy us shawls and dresses,
Or candied drops,
Or lemon pops,
Stand treat when heat oppresses!
The ducks and dears,
We'll soothe their fears,
And show a heap of sorrow,
Just as it suits,
For gloves or boots,
That's wanted for the morrow;
O, can't we wile,
And coax and smile,
When they of cash seem weary,
To get the "job".
And ease their fob,
Leaving them ne'er a nary!"

A Father living near Cincinnati, was one evening learning his little boy to recite his Sunday school lesson. It was from the 14th chapter of Matthew, wherein is related the parable of the malicious individual who went about sowing tares, etc. "What is a tare, Johnny?" inquired the parent. Johnny hesitated. "Tell me, my son, what a tare is." "You have had 'em, you know, father," said Johnny, casting down his eyes and wriggling his foot. "Had 'em!" repeated the astonished parent, opening his eyes rather wide; "why, what do you mean, Johnny?" "When you didn't come home for three whole days last week," replied Johnny, "I heard mother tell Aunt Susan that you was off on a tare!" The school was brought to a close rather abruptly, and Johnny retired supperless to bed that evening.

A young lady out West was charged with "putting on airs" because she refused to go to a ball barefooted.

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.
QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street,
San Francisco.
Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secresy, and all Sexual Disorders.
TO THE AFFLICTED.
Dr. W. K. Doherty returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self-Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secresy.
TO FEMALES.
When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, they should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about their troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.
TO CORRESPONDENTS.
Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.
If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.
Consultation, by letter or otherwise, Free. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.,
San Francisco, Cal.
SPERMATORRHŒA.

TO THE UNFORTUNATE.
NEW REMEDIES! NEW REMEDIES!
Dr. Gibbon's Dispensary.

ESTABLISAED IN 1854,
616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco.
For the treatment of Sexual and Seminal Diseases, such as gonorrhœa, gleet, stricture, syphilis in all its forms, seminal weakness, impotency, &c. Skin Diseases, (of years' standing,) and Ulcerated legs, successfully treated.
HORRIBLE DISEASES.
How many thousands of persons both male and female are there who are suffering out a miserable existence from the effects of secret indulgence, or from virus absorbed into the system. Look at their pallid, emaciated and disfigured faces, and their broken constitutions, disqualifying them for the happiness of marriage or the enjoyment of life. In this horrid situation thousands suffer until death closes the scene. Let parents, guardians and friends, attend to those who are suffering with any of these horrible, life-destroying maladies—see that they are cared for and cured before it be too late. Send them to Dr. Gibbon, a physician who has made private diseases his especial study for years, and who is certain to cure the most inveterate cases without mercury or any injurious drugs. It is important to those who are afflicted, to be careful of the many pretended Doctors who infest all cities, publishing their skill in curing all diseases in a few days, imposing upon the public by using the names of eminent physicians from Europe and other places. Be therefore careful and make strict inquiry, or you may fall into the hands of these charlatans.
Syphilis is syphilis the world over; so is small pox, consumption, and other diseases, to the contrary of what quacks may say.
SEMINAL WEAKNESS.
Seminal weakness the consequent of self abuse. This solitary vice, or depraved sexual indulgence, is practiced by the youth of both sexes to an almost unlimited extent, producing with unerring certainty the following train of morbid symptoms, unless combatted by scientific medical measure; sallow countenances, dark spots under the eyes, pain in the head, ringing in the ears, noise like the rustling of leaves and rattling of chariots, uneasines about the loins, weakness of the limbs, confused vision, blunt intellect, loss of confidence, diffidence in approaching strangers, a dislike to form new acquaintances, a disposition to shun society, loss of memory, hectic flushes, pimples and various eruptions about the face, furred tongue, fetid breath, coughs, consumption, night sweats, monomania, and frequent insanity. If relief be not obtained, should apply immediately, either in person or by letter, and have a cure effected by his new and scientific mode of treating this complaint, which never fails of effecting a quick and radical cure. Dr. G. will give $100 to any person who will prove satisfactorily to him that he was cured by either of the San Francisco quacks.
Dr. Gibbon is responsible, and will give each patient a written instrument binding himself to effect a radical and permanent cure or make no charge.
Persons at a distance may be cured at home by addressing a letter to Dr. Gibbon, stating case, symptoms, length of time the disease has continued, and have medicine promptly forwarded, free from damage and curiosity, to any part of the country, with full and plain directions for use, for ten dollars, sent in a registered letter, or through Wells, Fargo & Co.
Address DR. J. F. GIBBON, 616 Kearney street, corner of Commercial, San Francisco, Postoffice Box 252.
CAUTION TO THE UNFORTUNATE.
Beware of the San Francisco quacks and pretenders who with bogus sworn-to certificates, dupe the unwary. Some of the self styled doctors whose names are to be found in all the daily and weekly papers of San Francisco and other places, are tradesmen, and become too lazy to work at their trade. Some are tinsmiths, shoemakers, newspaper carriers, intelligence offices keepers, etc. Look over the San Francisco City Directory and you will find their former occupation in it. Look at the Directory for 1862-63. The only way to avoid imposition is make inquiry—it will cost you nothing and may save you many regrets, for advertising physicians in eight cases out of ten are bogus, there is no safety in trusting any of them till you know who and what they are. Dr. Gibbon does not deceive people by exhibiting bogus titles, certificates, pretended patients' letters, etc. Dr. Gibbon Will satisfy persons who may call at his office of his ability to treat diseases that he proposes to cure.
☞ Persons writing to Dr. Gibbon will Please state the name of the paper they see his advertisement in.

A RARE GEM OF ART.
"The Lord's Prayer,"
A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the
LAST SUPPER,
Reproducing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniature groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphael's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of
OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.
Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

MARY ANN LEEDOM, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days; or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant, awarding the care and custody of her daughter Julia to plaintiff, and allowing her to resume her maiden name.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

[SEAL.] WM. LOEWY, Clerk,
By OCTAVIUS BELL, Deputy Clerk.

PASTORAL LETTER OF THE BISHIP OF CALIFORNIA.

After many years of unrecompensed Episcopal labor, being now in receipt of a regular stipend or salary from the Diocese of California, and having won, as it were, a pecuniary recognition of my position, it becomes my bounden duty where any particular form of sin is glaring in the community to "premonish" those committed to my chargo, to address them a solemn warning, and in other ways to "earn my wage" as the medieval fathers have quaintly expressed it. And owing to the inattention, indifference and even non-attendance which too often prevail on the occasion of my oral teachings, there is no other way in which I can reach you except through the columns of a worldly newspaper in the form of a Pastoral Letter. This form is, I take it, not without "due precedence and authority." Were I inclined to quote the Romish Church, I might point you to the Pontifical Allocution, and Encyclical Letter, but the Church of England has in her own domain sufficient examples. I remember, at the Palace at Lambeth, to have been consulted by his Lordship in regard to a "Pastoral," touching the hasty, irreverent and unhallowed "holting" of sacramental wine and bread by the youthful and famished communicants among the parochial poor, and that my suggestion that personal rebuke and discipline were better for the lower order than "pastorals," was cordially received by his Lordship. I might point out the recent letter of the Bishop of Oxford in regard to the "mixed chalice" profanely termed "grog" by an unregenerate solicitor, but I refrain from multiplying examples. The "due authority and precedent" of this form of address, is, I think, fully demonstrated.

In this city, whose population is composed of so many diverse elements, whose civilization is hard, cold and material, whose faults are manifold, it might be supposed that I should address you in regard to meanness, selfishness, corruption, gambling, flippancy, skepticism, avariciousness, snobbishness, illiberality, want of humanity, and the countless failings of our California civilization. But herein you would fall in error. Holy Church leaves these topics to the discussion of so-called moralists, newspapers, reformers and unevangelical ministers. I wish to speak to you on the desecration of the Lord's Day.

I am no advocate for the severity of a Jewish Sabbath—nor in deed of any other denominational Sabbath, but that of the Church of England. Whenever the peculiar sanctity and formality of this day is lost, not only the Church but the vocation of its "ministers, priests and deacons" are gone. The minister is peculiarly a Sabbath teacher: the church is peculiarly a Sabbath institution; hence, when you break the peculiar professional sanctity of that day, when, as I learn with mortification, you attempt to spread your religion through the week, and thus feebly try to apologise for a seventh day remissness you offend the Church. Those who plead the example of foreign population do seriously err; what is forgiven in the German, Lutheran or French Catholic is damned in the English Protestant. I might point you to the Sunday dinner party, where the sacredness of the day is lost in festivity, where religious austerity is lost in human enjoyment and cheerfulness, where indecorous hilarity and jest take the place of solitary anchorite repasts, where the hard-working mechanic invites a guilty confederate to cut his unhallowed Sunday mutton with him, and the Lord's holiday is disgraced by human family or friendly reunions around the social board. I might speak of the Saturday night ball, projected past the secular limits into the next holy day, of the quadrille commenced at five minutes to twelve and ending at five minutes past twelve, leaving the "head couple" and the "first figure" spiritually guiltless, but involving the "sides" and "second figure" in hopeless damnation—I might, I say speak of these things, but I won't.

For worse than all is the SUNDAY PICNIC. As I write these words, my brethren, my pen staggers, the ink refuses to flow, and I blush even in the seclusion of my study. I feel that when Bishop Burgess, of Maine, or any respectable kindred, read these lines, their aristocratic breasts will tremble in their shirt frills; not so much, perhaps, at the open violation of God's holy day as that any member of a refined and fashionable church should so far forget him or herself, as to make a rural holiday of a day usually left to the suburban recreation of apprentices, bond maidens and tradesfolk. And when that gay party passed to the scene of their festivities what was the effect on the vulgar mind? When too, the day had closed, while through all its hours Frivolity had held its carnival, Devotion kept lent, while Jocularity had been ordained, Jest baptized, Sentiment christened, Levity churched, and the damnation of the whole party Confirmed, then do you believe your conduct becoming those "who profess and call themselves Christians?" No, brethren; if this Diocese understand itself—No.

But worse, if possible, than the influence upon yourselves has been that upon "them that are without." If you had kept your indiscretion secret, I might have been spared this pastoral letter. But being people of "good report" socially and financially as well as spiritually, your conduct is continually quoted by scorners outside of the church. "These," say the infidels, in the unrefined language of their order, "these are high old Christians and churchmen—ain't they!" My Christian brethren, consider the mortifying position in which you place yourselves—in which you place the church—in which you place me!

Beloved—the church asks but little. It interferes not with your secular gambling, swindling, licentiousness, gluttony and intemperance—it takes no account of these peccadillos if confined to week days. But it entreats, nay, demands, a proper observance of its Sabbath formula. And in this I, your Bishop, am firm.

WILLIAM CALIFORNIA. †

A Villainous Boarding-House Keeper.

A man who keeps a boarding-house and contracts to give people all they can eat for a stated sum per week, has written an article against eating and drinking which is going the rounds of the press, and is quoted by all the special-contract boarding-house-keepers in this State. This smart fellow starts thus:

"Great eaters never live long. A voracious appetite, as far from being a sign of health, is a certain indication of disease."

We know that man. We know that he considers the man who eats three buckwheat cakes and drinks two cups of coffee at breakfast, has a voracious appetite. He is in the habit of saying as he pours out the second cup of coffee and sees the last buckwheat cake undergoing the process of demolition, "Great eaters never live long." This stingy boarding-house keeper tells us that Kentigern, who never tasted spirits or wine, and worked hard all his life, reached a hundred and eighty-five years. Jenkens, a poor Yorkshire fisherman, who lived on the coarsest diet, was one hundred and sixty-nine years old when he died. Old Parr lived to a hundred and fifty-three; his diet being milk, cheese, whey, small beer and coarse bread. The favorite food of Henry Francisco, who lived to be one hundred and forty, was tea, bread and butter, and baked apples. Epharim Pratt, of Shutesbury, Mass., who died, aged one hundred and seventeen, lived chiefly on milk, and even that in small quantity; his son Michael, by similar means lived to be a hundred and three years old. And so he goes on giving examples of persons who lived long lives, and died without ever knowing the luxury of a good dinner. His last instance is that of a wretched old Methodist clergyman, who lived on bacon and bread made of Indian meal for one hundred and five years. What civilized being would accept one hundred and five years of life on such terms? He finally says:

"We need not expect to live long by doing any one thing which an old man did and omit all others, but by doing as he did, that is, work steadily as well as eat mainly a particular dish."

These statements are abominably wicked and utterly false. Mortuary statistics prove that the two classes whose members live the longest are gentlemen and paupers, and that the average lifetime of the laborer is the lowest of all. That infamous boarding-house keeper would no doubt be much pleased could be persuade his boarders that if they would be contented with "a particular dish" (corned pork,) and work steadily at washing dishes, sawing wood and doing chores generally, they would be sure to live to the age of the degraded Henry Francisco, who lived for one hundred and forty years on tea, bread and butter and baked apples, or the ostrich-stomached Methodist clergyman, who lived on bacon for one hundred and five years. He'd like it, but we at least have the satisfaction of knowing that we have done all that lay in our power to expose the infamous hypocrite and block his little game.

Those Horrid Daily Papers.

When one engages in an ungrateful task, it is pleasing to find that one's exertions in a good cause are recognized. The following letter cheered our drooping spirits and afforded us encouragement to go on in our good work:

MR. LION'S MOUTH: Newspaper grammar is becoming frightfully deranged, nowadays. What is the matter? Is it that gentlemen of this high craft have grown careless of the proprieties, or can it be that the fault is of a grover nature?

Citing examples to you would indeed be labor lost—for have not you, yourself, observed, painfully, the indiscriminate application of singular and plural verbs to such substantives as "public," "company," "bank," etc.? One popular journal speaks of a "man who seen another man," etc. Now, since the demise of the late Mr. Bickerstaff, (peace to his ashes,) the mantle of the censor has fallen upon no shoulders worthier than your own—this is the reason why this complaint goes straight to your court. If you will but read the daily papers, as they will appear between this day and next Saturday—mark my word, good Mr. Censor—you will find in them candidates for flagelation—in numbers more than sufficient for your rod.

I simply aspire to the honor if hinting at these derelictions, and am content, having done so. Pardon, Great Mr. Censor, the liberty I have taken in this communcation. FRESHMAN.

"Freshman" flatters us. We have, perhaps, done a little towards checking Fitz-Smythe from indulging in the infamous breaches of all the laws of grammar which he delights in making, we may have occasionally read the editors of the daily papers a lesson which has proved of service to them; but still we fear we have accomplished but little, "Freshman's" complaint has but too much foundation. Though our modesty will not allow us to admit that the mantel of the late Mr. Bickerstaff has fallen on our shoulders, we will never be a silent spectator of ruthless assaults on the English language, but will ever act as the guardian of all that is correct in the speech, morals and manners of the people of San Francisco.

A Good Thing Indeed.

The following advertisement appeared in the Times of this city on Thursday, Sept. 19th:

THE advertiser being in the enjoyment of a GOOD THING, is willing to impart it to a select number of subscribers. THIS is bona fide. Send thirteen three cent stamps, and direct "M.," TIMES OFFICE, care of W. H. BARTON.

We are really in enjoyment of a good thing, too good a thing to be kept to ourselves, we therefore impart it to our select, but at the same time numerous subscribers. In the last issue of the CALIFORNIAN, September 14th, we published an article taken from Charles Dickens' Magazine, All the Year Round, entitled a Good Thing. To this article we refer our readers. We must, however, give a slight sketch of its purport. It open thus:

I am ashamed to confess that I have been a thief. It is humiliating to reflect that, at an earlier period of my career, I should at any time have so far forgotten myself as to have been guilty of the vulgar offence of petty larceny from the person. It is sad to remember, moreover, that, this being my third mistake of that nature, I was condemned for it to five years' penal servitude. Doubly humiliating it was when after having been liberated on a ticket-of-leave for good conduct, I discovered how many professions were open to me of a far more lucrative character than my former calling, and although beyond the reach of the law."

The writer then relates how he raised a capital of fifteen pounds by a smart transaction in pawn-broker's tickets. He then says:

"I next purchased ten pounds' worth of postage stamps, and then sent the subjoined advertisement to three daily newspapers, directing it to be inserted every other day: three insertions in each paper only:

THE advertiser, being in the enjoyment of a GOOD THING, is willing to impart it to a select number of subscribers. This is bona fide. Send thirteen postage stamps and a directed envelope to "M.," Esq., care of "H. W.," at Messrs. Danton & Birch, Moon street, City."

We will not relate how the manner in which the "Good Thing" swindle was successfully worked and realized for its projector a profit of £553,14,5 within a few months. We will only give the concluding remarks:

"I wish to add a general moral.

To steal in the lump from any one person is disreputable and foolish, besides rendering you amenable to the law; but so to conduct your negotiations as to distribute a given loss (your profit) among the largest possible body of constituents, is the true theory of commercial prosperity."

Those who wish to read the article itself, can, as we observed before, do so either in All the Round, or in the last number of THE CALIFORNIAN. The man who inserted that advertisement in the Times five days, after an article exposing a real or imaginary swindle must be the most verdant of beings. Even supposing that he had hit upon some original scheme he would have found that Californians are not so easily gulled as Londoners. The postage stamp dodge won't work here. The fact of this bare-faced attempt having been made, is in our opinion, one of the very best things out.

The Recluse of Sansome Street.

Many persons who have gazed at the gigantic pitcher on the top of a crockery store on Sansome street, may not be aware that it is the abode of a human being. Mr. Fitzsimmons Brown, a well-known citizen of San Francisco, assured us that such is the case. It appears that at the time the aforesaid pitcher was building, there was in this city a misanthrope of the name of Samifer, who had long desired to seclude himself from contact with humanity as far as was possible. To be brief; Semifer rented the big pitcher, and made arrangements to have his food sent up to him by means of a system of ropes and pullies. Samifer paid for three years' board, lodging and attendance in advance and retired to his pitcher. He has never been seen since. The proprietor of the big pitcher store has faithfully fulfilled their engagement, and each day a sufficient quantity of coarse, but wholesome and nutritious food is hoisted into the pitcher. A few persons know of this strange fact, and those few daily stop and gaze at the big pitcher, and wonder how Samifer likes it. Strange hallucination! Incomprehensible mania! TREM.

BULLET MARKS.

WE were sitting round our tent one evening, at Wimbledon—the "we" being our major, the captain and sub of our company, his covering sergeant, corporal Williams, and a captain sapper, to wit, myself. We were drinking pale ale and smoking, as was every one else in the hundred tents around us.

"Here's my last bull's-eye," and the sergeant produced from his cap-pouch a flattened bullet, turned inside out as neatly as possible.

"What's the cause of that, I wonder?" said the corporal.

"You see," said the captain—being an engineer he was bound to know—"when the point of the bullet strikes the target, part of the lead is melted by the development of heat caused by the sudden arrest of the bullet's motion, and goes off in the splash, the rest of the bullet is softened by the heat; and inasmuch as the parts must stop in their order of succession, the edge of the cup of the bullet is driven in level with the base of the cup. Is that so, Major?"

"Yes, quite right; but, if you like, I can spin you a yarn about these same bullets, that may just last out these weeds."

"Well, let's have it."

I had a sort of second cousin, Gerald Ashton, who had been brought up with myself and my sister, my father being his guardian.

We had all been like brother and sister, when one day he woke up to find he could not live without a nearer relationship to her. He spoke to the old gentleman, and there was a little fracas.

He had only a hundred a year, and my father did not think that was enough, though Gerald did; there was no objection at all in other respects—let him earn some more and they would see—wait a little—you know the kind of thing an old gentleman would say. Well, it was of no use. He said he felt himself a burden; there was no scope for his energies, and he would go—and go he did.

I urged upon him that he should get something to do. He had been well educated, and a clerkship, or something of the kind, could be got for him if he still resolved not to go on at the hospital.

No—he would go. There was only one thing he did do well, that was shoot; and he would carry his abilities to a market where they would be appreciated. And so, at the mature age of twenty-two, he left us, his profession, his home and his prospects.

He disappeared, and six months after we heard he was with, say the 40th Dragoons, in India.

We wrote, and offered to buy his discharge, but he would "have done of us." He liked it very well; was already corporal; expected the three stripes soon; and was, "Gentleman Jack" with his comrades.

Six months after this I was sent out to India with a company; and as my sister was getting thin, and showing other signs of the desirability of a sea-voyage, and of a warm climate, it was agreed I should take her over.

We searched Calcutta, and in a few weeks settled down.

There was war going on, and I was placed in charge of one of the chief depots for small arms and ammunition, besides having my regular duties with the company.

One day I was down at the store, when my sister arrived, pale and breathless.

"Look, Charles, poor Gerald's in dreadful trouble."

I put her into an office chair, and took the newspaper and read—

"Yesterday evening, as an officer of the 40th Dragoon Guards was returning to camp he was shot from behind a clump of bushes; the bullet struck him in the thigh and lodged in the saddle. Although wounded so severely he had presence of mind to ride straight to the bushes, and there found one of his own men, a corporal of the troop, nicknamed "Gentleman Jack" by his comrades, whose rifle was still smoking from the discharge. Fortunately, at this moment, the guard arrived, and the man was at once arrested. A court-martial will, of course, be held at once, and, although the man has previously borne a good character, and is reported to be respectably connected, it is to be hoped he will receive the proper reward for so abominable a crime."

"Oh," I said, "this is all nonsense. Gerald's no murderer, or else he's very much changed. I'll see what they say at headquarters."

"Do, for God's sake, go. If anything happened to Gerald I should never forgive myself, for if I had run away with him when papa was so cruel, he never would have enlisted at all."

"Don't talk nonsense, Meggie," but go home, and I'll come with the telegraph news."

I went to headquarters; they gave me permission to use the telegraph for a question or two. The report was not encouraging.

It was our Gerald—the officer had seen the flash and heard the report—an extremely loud report, as if there had been two charges of powder in the carbine.

The bullet was found in the saddle, and one cartridge was missing from his twenty rounds. Court-martial had declared him guilty, and the General's confirmation of the sentence had just arrived. Fifty lashes in the camp square, and four years imprisonment in the jail. Sentence to be carried out on the 12th. Everybody very sorry, but quite convinced he had tried to murder his superior officer. No one could understand with what motive.

I did not know what to think; there was more evidence forthcoming in a day or two, when we had the papers.

His statement in defence was, that he had just been returning from the guard when he remembered that he had forgotten to bring in a book one of the officers had asked him to bring in from the town some three miles distant. Without stopping to think he walked off at once; got the book, and was within half a mile of the camp, when he fancied he saw a tiger. He got behind the bushes to watch, and saw one making for the distant camp. Anxious to secure the prize, he incautiously broke open one of his packages, and loaded, to have a shot at it. He had covered the beast, and was firing at the tiger, when he heard another report simultaneously with that of his own carbine. He saw the tiger roll right over as if shot, and then bound away. In another instant the officer came round the tope bleeding and ordered his arrest. He was quite sure that he hit the tiger, and equally sure that another rifle was fired at the same moment that he pulled the trigger.

Of course such a lame statement had no effect, and he was sentenced.

I could not help thinking that there was a flaw in the evidence. How was it if there was, as agreed, a loud report—which meant a full charge of powder—that the bullet stopped at the saddle, instead of going though both saddle and horse. That was a great discrepancy—a full charge would have made a loud report, and sent it right through anything at a distance of two hundred yards. I felt there was something wrong, and made up my mind to go on the spot. I had but six days to go in, but much might be done. Margaret insisted on going with me in spite of all I could do to keep her away.

"Have I not done all you wished me to do since we have been out here? Do, for heaven's sake, let me have my way in this."

So we went up the country in post haste.

I was, of course, as one of the staff, admitted to see poor Gerald, whom I found terribly cut up.

"I don't mind the imprisonment; its the disgrace! The lashes! By God! I shall kill myself directly I get loose after it, I know I shall."

"No, no," said Meggie; don't, for my sake. Oh Gerald! if you know how I have suffered for weeks past, you would live for my sake. I do not care about the brand or the lashes. I know you are innocent, and that there has been some horrible blunder committed in this matter. Oh, Willie, dear, do think of something to save him"

"Oh, do, there's a good fellow! get me some stuff that will make an end of me."

"Don't talk like that, Gerald; there's some infernal mistake in it. Don't despair yet. Let's go over the ground again step by step," and I made him tell me the whole story over again.

"It seems to me, Gerald, we want not a few things to show you are not guilty. We want the tiger you shot at, and that we shan't get; and we want the clue to the mystery of the other rifle."

"Oh, I've thought of it all till I'm sick. I don't care what happens now. I'll wait till the day before it's to come off, and then break my head against the walls."

"Don't be a fool, Gerald! I'm sure you are innocent. So is Margaret."

"Yes; so are a hundred others; but it's all no use. In three days I am disgraced for live, if I life."

"Well, I must leave you now, and see what I can do."

"Let me have five minutes with Meggie, will you?"

I left them alone for some ten minutes, and then told Meggie she must go home with me.

I was beaten; I could not see how I could get any fresh evidence, and without that a reprieve—a postponement—was impossible.

I went to the wounded officer, the captain of his own company, and got him to tell his own story; it was just the same thing over again—always the exceedingly loud report, and the fouled and still smoking carbine.

"I would," said the captain, "have given the price of my commission rather than have had it happen. He's as fine a fellow as ever sat a horse; brave, kind, and as thorough a gentleman as the colonel himself; I always made him my orderly when I could, so as to have company. I declare to you that I did my best at the court martial for him, and got into disgrace with the general presiding for 'coloring my statements'—that was his expression—so as to favor the prisoner. I almost sniveled when I heard the sentence, as if he had been my own brother. The men are mad about it; there has not been a lash or public punishment of any kind in the regiment for the last twenty-five years."

I hardly knew how to pass the time; I tried to think, but my ideas only traveled in the same old grooves again.

I invited the assistant-surgeon to come up to my quarters, and introduce him to my sister. He was quite a young fellow, and seemed quite flattered by my simple attention, for in the army they have not quite made up their minds whether a medical officer should be treated as a gentleman; but the strangest thing I ever saw in my life was my sister's conduct. Of course, speaking to you fellows I shan't be misunderstood, and some of you have seen her. She laid herself out to please him to an extent I never should have thought my dear grave Meggie capable of; sang to him, played to him, and made eyes at him till I thought her brain was turned. She said she should so like to see his quarters, asked him to ask us to lunch, and shut me up like a rat-trap, when I ventured to hint that it might not be convenient.

Well, he went away at last as mad as she. I spoke to her after he was gone, and she fell into my arms, sobbing as if her heart was breaking, and then, without a word of explanation, ran out of the room.

Next day we went to his quarters, and nothing would satisfy her but that he should mix up some medicine for her out of the bottle of this little traveling case. There she was, handling, and sniffing, and tasting everything, like a child of ten rather than a girl of eighteen. She sent him about the room; made him bring books from the opposite side of it so that she might read about the properties of the drugs; and, in short, behaved so like a lunatic that I thought the trouble about Gerald must have affected her mind. I got her away at last, and intended to insist on her remaining in the house and putting some ice on her head. It was quite unnecessary; the minute we left the surgery she was calm and silent as a nun.

"Well, the days passed in some sort of dreary fashion till the evening of the 11th. I had been asked during the day to go down with the officers to see some rifle practice some temporary marks, and I went down.

It was rather late when I rode up to the firing point, and they were just leaving off; and one of them came up and said:

"I say, captain, tell us the cause of these bullets turning inside out?" and he handed me a bullet reversed; just such another as William had in his hand.

I took it, just to explain the matter to him, when a thought struck through my mind like a flash of lightning.

"Saved, by God!" I exclaimed. "Who's got the bullet out of the saddle?"

"What bullet?"

"Gerald's—my cousins."

"Oh! Gentleman Jack's affair. The doctor's got it."

"Where is he?"

"Don't know—quarters, I think."

"No, he's come into town; I saw him on the road as we came by."

I sped on into the town, leaving them to think what they pleased; and spent more than two hours finding the doctor. At last I caught him.

In another minute we were riding full gallop to his quarters.

He had the bullet—a little bruised and flattened, and blunted at the point—it must have been just spent when it struck.

I then went to the sergeant who had charge of the nineteen rounds of ammunition that were found in Gerald's pouch. About midnight I contrived to find him, and after some little delay I got possession of them.

I then returned to the doctor, and we compared the nineteen bullets with the one found in the saddle. I then ran to the telegraph clerk, roused him out of bed, and told him to telegraph to the headquarters in Calcutta, to my lieutenant in charge of the magazines.

After an hour's waiting, ringing at the bell, an answer came that the night watchman would fetch the lieutenant. I then sent message No. 1.

"Examine the books, and see the dates on which the last ammunition was sent for the use of the 40th Dragoons; find the same parcel, and carefully remove one cartridge from each of twenty packets, selected at random; take out bullets, and remove plugs; and send No. in base of cup of bullets."

The answer came back that he understood, and would rouse up the people to do it.

After an hour and a half, the answer came back—

"All the bullets are numbered 5, with a dot on the right."

I then sent message No. 2:

"Examine what cartridges bear that No. 2 with a dot on the left, and report to whom issued, and when—report quickly—a man's life depends on speed.

Again I waited another hour. No answer came.

It was getting late—half-past two; at four the parade would take place. I urged more speed.

The reply came:

"We have ten men employed in breaking open barrels, and searching. No No. 2 yet found."

At last it came:

"One barrel No. 2 in store: the rest of the same shipment was damaged and useless, and sold in bulk to native dealers for value in old metal at one of the clearance sales some time ago."

I had learned all I could. I spurred back to camp with the bullets, from which I had never parted, in my pouch. I shall never forget the scene.

In the middle of the camp the men were drawn up in three sides of a square; in the centre of the square were the triangles, with Gerald lashed to them. I saw them as I came down the hill take off his jacket and lash his wrists. I sped on. I could see the old colonel, with the paper in his hand, standing alone, and then I saw nothing more, for a dip in the road concealed them; as I rose again to the crest at less than a quarter of a mile, I saw a woman rush in from between the ranks towards the triangles, holding something in her hand. I darted on, and rushed into the square, but just in time to seize the farrier's arm, as the lash was descending, and to see that the woman was my sister, and that she was being led away between two sergeants.

"Stop, colonel, for the love of God!" I cried, with my hand still grasping the farrier's arm; "I have evidence to prove the man not guilty."

I then showed the colonel the bullet that had come from the saddle and the others from the pouch, and pointed out to him that while one was marked No. 2, the others were all marked No. 5, with dot. I assured him on my honor as an officer and a gentleman, that it was almost impossible that a No. 2 bullet could get into a packet of No. 5 bullets. He was only too glad to hear me, and agreed to postpone the execution of the sentence till further orders from the general of his division.

I've heard some shouts, and I've seen some displays of enthusiasm in my time, but I never shall forget the shout that rose the minute that the colonel had pronounced that the execution of the sentence upon Corporal Ashton would be postponed until further orders.

The men had been standing at "attention," many of them with the tears rolling down their cheeks, but when they heard "postponed," they broke ranks, rushed up to the triangles, cut the lashings, broke the cat, screamed, shouted, danced like madmen.

"Three cheers for 'Gentleman Jack' and his wife? Again! again, boys?"

Officers and all joined in for a few minutes. There stood the old grey-headed colonel in the midst of a scene that outbedlamed Bedlam.

As for me I was like a man in a dream; I felt a hundred hands grasping mine. I had my sister sobbing in my arms, and then I heard the colonel say to the bugler, "Sound the assembly."

What a change! in less than a minute I stood by the fallen triangles in the centre of three lines of living statues. Not a sound; not a movement.

"Major Jackson, reform your column and break off the men," said the colonel; and then walked away with myself and my sister.

"But what did your sister do there?"

Well, she had promised Gerald that he should not suffer the disgrace of the lash; and had, during the hour I thought she was fooling with the doctor, managed to get hold of his bottle of prussic acid, and had rushed out with half of it for him and half for herself; and her appearance had so thoroughly surprised every one that she had reached the triangles, and almost raised it to his lips, when the doctor, recognizing his own blue bottle, struck her hand a violent blow, and dashed it to the ground, besides disabling her from getting her own share.

"And how did the affair end? was the general of the division satisfied?"

"I don't think he would have been with that evidence alone, and so he went about to hunt for more. I begged that, as we had found so much, Gerald might be permitted to accompany a party of search, under a guard, to find the missing tiger.

"We went there, Meggie insisted on joining us. All the officers off duty went, and about half the men.

"Gerald then pointed out the spot where he had stood, and where he shot the tiger; and from that point we started, crossing and recrossing, till there could not have been anything as large as a half-crown that could be hidden.

"Meggie and I were riding in front of the line, when Meggie exclaimed:

"'What a horrible smell comes from that copse?'

"Don't smell anything, Meg."

"'You've lived here so long, that you've no sense of smell left."

Of course as Meggie was with us, Blinkers was there too. Blinkers advanced to the copse—paused—and rushed underneath the grass, barking as if infuriated.

"There's something in there, Willie."

Some of the others coming up, we pushed our way into the depths, guided by the frantic bark of Blinkers, and, after being much scratched and torn, found ourselves in the centre of a trampled circle of jungle grass, with the half-devoured remains of a large tiger.

The doctor was sent for, and the wound discovered: the beast had evidently been lamed, the bullet breaking the foreleg. It was also evident that, wounded as it was, it had lingered on till it was mere skin and bone, and had died only within the last few days. Assisted by some natives, the good-natured doctor commenced the horrible task of searching for the bullet, and, after half an hour's labor, the most disgusting he had ever undergone, it was found flattened against the large bone of the hind leg, and handed to me.

Never shall I forget the pleasure I felt when I saw on the rescued bullet, the No. 5, with a dot as fresh and clear as if it had just come from the pressing machine.

Great was the rejoicing that night in the camp of the 40th. Blue fires were burnt, the band came and serenaded Meggie. The whole of the officers, including the old colonel, come as to a levee; but still I felt there was one thing more to be found out. How did the No. 2 bullet get into the saddle?

At length I enquired whether any of the officers missed any of their arms. Curiously enough, the only missing arm was a gun belonging to the wounded captain. I asked, did he remember the size. He did. It was just a shade smaller than the bore of the regimental carbines. You could get a government bullet down by a good deal of hammering.

I now propounded my theory, that the bullet No. 2 had been fired from the captain's missing rifle, for the point of the bullet was marked with rings, and considerably flattened. Now, there was nothing in the flesh, and nothing in the saddle to produce these marks, and they must therefore have been made before firing.

I then proposed that a full search should be made with dogs, for at least two miles round, from where the shot was fired, to see if any traces could be found of either the man or the gun.

We made the most careful search; presently I came to a stone on the road itself, marked in a most peculiar manner.

"What's the cause of these marks? said I to the farrier of the troop, who had volunteered to help, and who said he never felt more grateful to any one in all his life, than he did to me for squeezing his wrist so hard that day.

"What's the cause? Its been used as a hammer for something—a nail in a shoe."

"Nail-heads are square."

"True for you—these are round."

"Do you think a ramrod would make these marks?"

"It just would. Somebody's been driving down a hard bullet with it."

"So I think. Now take this stone and throw it straight over that gap into the middle of the copse, and I'll mark where it seems to fall."

He threw it, and marked the spot, we found our way into the jungle; and there, within a few yards of the stone, under the long leaves, we found what we sought—the remains of a native, stripped entirely of bones and skin except on the hands and feet, and with a great gaping wound in the skull; and in the inside, which the ants had perfectly cleaned out, was a large piece of the breech of the burst gun he had by his side.

The whole evidence was there; two empty cartridge cases; another No. 2 bullet; eight untouched cartridges. It was clear enough that the man, who ever he was, had taken the captain's gun, and putting in two charges of powder, rammed down the too large bullet with the blows of the stone on the now bruised end of the ramrod; and the loud report that all the witnessess spoke of was as loud as the simultaneous report of the discharge of three charges of powder could make it. While the want of force in the bullet was accounted for by the bursting of the gun.

We took home the skull, and the burst rifle, and the cartridge cases, together with some remnants of clothing; and we there found the intended murderer to have been one of the syces, or grooms of the captain, that he had horsewhipped a month before for ill-using a horse of which he had charge.

Of course there was a new trial ordered, and as the evidence was unquestionable, Gerald was discharged.

"Was he discharged?"

"Not a bit—Why should he? The men worshipped him, and the officer who was wounded was invalided; and he and his comrades managed matters among them so well, that at the first parade of the regiment, in Calcutta, some six months afterwards, the old colonel presented to the men a new officer, Captain Aston, added, "If he makes half as good an officer as he did a soldier there will not be a better in her Majesty's service.

"And your sister Margaret?"

"Oh, I've just sent a little case lined with velvet, and something inside engraved 'William Gerald Ashton, from his affectionate uncle.'"

Now, lads, there's the 'out lights,' so we'll turn in quietly, and make bull's-eyes at every shoot to-morrow."

"Infantry."—The term infantry, when applied to foot soldiers, takes its origin from one of the infantas (princesses) of Spain, who, hearing that the army commanded by her father had been defeated by the Moors, assembled a body of foot soldiers, who were not before held in much consideration, they received the name of infantry.

GOING TO SCHOOL.

He helped her over the meadow brook,
While her feet were timidly set
(Twin lilies they were!) on the mossy stone,
With the cooling ripples wet.

They passed the brook, and it seemed to sing
With a sweeter, merrier sound,
As the two with their school-books wandered on
O'er the clover laden ground.

O, little maiden! how fair you were,
With your eyes of heavenly blue;
And the dimples played on your cheeks, as play
On the rose, the drops of dew.

As play on a rose the drops of dew,
When the breezes merrily blow!
And your lips, they were tints of the ripening peach,
In the morning's ruddy glow.

Bare feet, how they twinkled around the grass!
Did you know, whenever you took
The path for school, that he waited for you,
By the willow-shaded brook?

Since then, the fragrant blossoms have come
To the boughs, ah! many a time;
And a bridge is over the brook, that sings,
As of old, its pleasant rhyme.

And two are straying upon the bank,
As I pen these wandering words,
And they talk of the happy school day time,
And they watch the building birds.

But a stream there is with a grander flow,
With a sterner, sadder song,
And the lovers will cross to a different school,
And help each other along!

Comparative Effects of Coffee and Wine.—Coffee is said to have a great effect upon the nervous system. A gentleman recently starved himself for some time and then swallowed a strong infusion of coffee, in order to experience its effect. He writes that: "Instantly I ceased to be communicative and kindly, I became cold, cross and selfish. My intellect labored without the slightest fatigue, and almost in spite of myself; upon any given subject it penetrated profoundly, and drew almost infinite consequences." Upon taking some wine, he ceased to be cross and egotistical, and became kind and sympathetic. From this it appears that too much strong coffee on an empty stomach is not productive of amiability, and there is peculiar appropriateness in the association of "coffee and pistols for two."

How the Burmese Kiss.—Chung Loo, a native Burmese, who has been educated in this country, and is now delivering lectures in this country, dressed in costume, in the course of his remarks at Marshall, imparted the following information, which may prove interesting to some.

I notice the ladies of this country sometimes paint to improve their complexion. They do so with us, using for that purpose powder made from a species of fragrant wood. Kissing is unknown with us as practiced in this country. Our language has no such word as kiss. The corresponding endearment in Burmah is to press the lips and nose to the cheek of the fair one and inhale the perfume. To ask for a kiss we say, "give me a smell."

Paris consumes as butcher's meat an average of two hundred horses per month. This meat is sold only for what it is, viz,: horseflesh. It is eaten consciously, and because it is palatable and nutritious. It takes all the forms of other meats, such as steaks, chops, sirloins, cutlets, rumps, ribs, and so forth, and is subjected to a similar variety of treatment. The Parisians, by the by, have lately tried to introduce the flesh of mules, also to the tables, but this has proved too much for even the enlightened digestion of the French people. In May the number of mules slaughtered for the markets there had fallen from sixty to nineteen per month,

The True Idea of Science.—When Newton discovered the laws of the solar system, he created, for all posterity, the true idea of science. He gave the most perfect example we are very likely to have, of that union of reasoning and observation, which by means of facts that can be directly observed ascends to laws which govern multitudes of other facts—laws which not only explain and account for what we see, but give us assurance beforehand of much that we do not see, much that we never could have found out by observation, though, having been found out, it is always verified by the results.—J. S. Mill.

Signs of the Weather.—When sea birds fly out early and far to seaward, fair weather may be anticipated; on the contrary, when they hang about the land or fly inward, stormy weather is indicated. When animals, instead of spreading over their usual range, seek sheltered places, storms may be expected. Dew is an indication of fine weather; so is fog; but clearness of the atmosphere near the horizon is a sign of wet. A good hearing day is also an indication of coming wet.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

YOUMANS ON MODERN CULTURE.

THE controversy now going on with so much animation, betweeu the lovers of the old fashioned classical course of collegiate education, and those who demand a radical change in the entire system, must possess the very highest interest for scholars and thinkers. In the present aspect of the discussion it is not so much ancient and modern literature that are placed in antagonism to one another, literature in general and science in general. Professor Youmans, however, is one of those few campanious of physical science as the chief element of modern culture who do not feel called upon to disparage the literature of imagination, sentiment, and faith, and who, while they would give the larger place in the scheme of education, to natural philosophy, chemistry, geology, and physical science generally, regard poetry, eloquence, and the fine arts together with those studies that the ethical and religious feeling as no less essential. But he strenuously maintains that the pretensions of classical learning have been exaggerated, that in the arrangement of studies in our seats of education the natural sciences have been kept too far in the back ground; and that the extravagant and often terrible drilling in philology to which pupils are subjected at an immature age is at war with the obvious dictates of reason and nature. In this position he is no doubt supported by many of the most eminent classical authorities of the present day. The vast circle of knowledge embraced within the scope of a true education at the present day is thus described in Professor Youmans recent work, "The Culture Demanded by Modern Life."

"The discipline and the knowledge conferred by study of the preceding group of sciences [physiology and psycology] form the true preparation for that higher class of studies, mental, moral, political, and literary, which comples the course of a true liberal educatiou. Although not themselves ranked as sciences, these extensive and important subjects are constantly becoming more scientific in their conceptions and methods, and hence form the natural sequel of a systematic scientific culture. Physiology passes insensibly into psychology, the central science, upon which hinge logic, sociology, political ecouomy, history, ethics, æsthetics, and literature. Mental phenomena are manifestations of life, and their laws are derivative of the laws of life; only through a knowledge of the former, therefore, it is possible to reach a true understanding of the latter. Logic treats of the laws of evidence and proof, by which things and their relations are truly represented in thought. Sociology considers the relations among human beings and the forces which act upon them in society, and it hence only becomes possible through a prior knowledge of the vital and mental organization of man;—political economy, a branch of this subject, treating of industrial and commercial questions, depends upon the same conditions. History is a record of the course of human experience in its multiform phases, and the key to its right interpretation is that knowledge of the character of the Actor and the circumstauces of action which it is the prerogative of science alone to give. Ethics, or moral science, determines the principles which should guide the right ruling of conduct, and depends upon every science which can throw light on the progress of the intellect, the evolutions, and the limits of moral liberty and responsibility imposed by the conditions of physical organizaiton or social circumstances. Æsthetics, which regards the beautiful in nature, and gives rise to the fine arts, depends upon the laws of feeling and sensibility. Its principles are founded in the constitution of human nature, and will probably be yet reduced to a scientific system. To work out its great ideas of "unity," "harmony," "proportion," and the laws of beauty, it awaits a better psychology, and a deeper penetration into the true spirit of nature. Literature is that great body of expression of thought upon a vast variety of subjects, the proper judgment of which depends upon the extent and accuracy of our knowledge of the truth of things in reality, conception, and expression.

"Thus does scientific culture reach its ultimate and exalted ends. Its course is along a line of connections which are casual and dynamic; its ideas constantly flowing on and widening out until they embrace all the higher subjects of human interest and inquiry. The order of dependence of facts and principles must here imperatively determine the true order of study. To pass from languages and mathematics to the complex questions of man and society, is to violate the continuity of nature's logic; to carry false methods of reasoning and judgment into the highest spheres of thought, and provide for those errors of theory and vices of practice which are so lamentably conspicuous in the management of social and public affairs. Only by that scientific discipline which confers a steadfast faith in the uoiversality of law, and only as the discipline of mathematical and physical studies is corrected and amplified by familiarity with biographical conceptions, will it be possible to secure a class of thinkers who can grapple with the upper grade of questions, in which the best welfare of society is involved. The culture afforded by these higher subjects is also varied, copious, and quickeoing. They give breadth, adaptiveness, and enlarged effect to the discipline of the preparatory sciences, and cultivate mental pliancy, readiness of judgment, and practical sagacity."

Professor Youmans further coutends that the prevalent dea of pursuing certain branches of study purely as a mental discipline rest upon a fallacious conception of the true purpose of culture. In a previous number of the CALIFORNIAN, we reviewed at considerable length the writer's essay on "The Scientific Study of Human Nature," the object of which was to enforce the principle that the basis of education to be found in the physical organization, and the old method of regarding the mind as something distinct from and independent of the body, is the fruitful scource of evil. This idea is repeated in the present work, and dwelt upon with great emphasis. The brain, it is insisted, is the organ of much, and is affected by every process of thought and feeling. The capacity of the brain limits the power of acquisition. If the methods of study occasion wide breaks in the action of the mind, so that past conceptions are not carried in a consecutive development, there is a loss of mental power. We can make steady and rapid progress only in coutinuous ranges of effort.

The studies which are at present employed for the purpose of "disciplining the mind" are objectionable from this point of view. They do not "enter into the intellectual life of the man: they present a foreign body of thought, which is hostile to the unity of the mental career. The young student is detached from his early associations, transported to the atmosphere of Greece and Rome for a course of years, becomes charged with the antiquated ideas, and then returns to resume his relations with the current of events in his own age. Having faithfully mastered his collegiate tasks, he finds that his acquisitions are not available in the world of action. He has to leave them behind and begin anew, if he would not lose the wealth of modern knowledge, and dilute his intellectual life with the thin nutriment of classical memories."

Professor Youmans thinks that the remedy for these evils is to be found in a judicious course of scientific education. His ideal of the "higher culture" demanded by the present age, is a scheme of study which shall represent the existing condition of knowledge, afford a various discipline, and at the same time prepare for the work of actual life, thus combining an "integral discipline," with "living and applicable knowledge." In regard to the defects in primary instruction, the author says:

"There is great significance in the fact that the prevailing higher culture is without a foundation. Professing to devote itself exclusively to the molding and evolution of mind—sinking knowledge itself into nothingness in comparison with this effect—its method does not reach back to those beginnings of culture which far outweigh in importance all subsequent action. And this is no trifling criticism of that method. Is it possible for a truly philosophical system of training the mental powers to have been organized for centuries in all the higher institutions, and not have reacted with controlling power upon the processes of primary instruction? Here a true method must begin, and here scientific education does begin. Commencing early, and commencing with nature, it lays the foundation of culture in the systematic exercise of the observing powers. In childhood there is a vast capability of accumulating simple facts. The higher forms of mental activity not having come into exercise, the whole plastic power of the brain is devoted to the storing up of perceptions, while the vigor of cerebral growth insures the highest intensity of mental adhesiveness. The capability of grasping relations being low, it makes but little difference at first what objects are presented to attention; words or things, with meaning or without, and in the most arbitrary order, stick readily in the memory. Skillful guidance at this period is of the very highest importance. When curiosity is freshest, and the perceptions keenest, and memory most impressible, before the maturity of the reflective powers, the opening mind should be led to the art of noticing the aspects, properties, and simple relations of the surrounding objects of Nature. This should be guided into a growing habit, and the young pupil gradually trained to know how to observe, and what to observe, among all the objects of its unfolding experience."

As mathematics is specially adapted to cultivate the deductive reasoning powers, so physics training equally to accuracy and precision of thought, exercises the reasou inductively. This point is very clearly put:

"In physics, from particulars we pass to generals; from observed facts to principles, by the mental process of induction, which is a powerful instrumentality. When we contemplate the vast extent of the facts which form the body of the various sciences, and the marvelous rapidity with which they are still accumulating, the task of their acquisition seems appalling, and utterly beyond all grasp of the intellect. But there is an order of Natnre by which individual facts are connected and bound together, and there is a corresponding capacity in the human mind of seizing upon those relations, of binding the facts into groups, and of dealing with them, as it were, at wholesale or in masses. This is the faculty of generalization, by which wide-reaching principles replace or represent the infinitude of details, which they include. Indeed, the advance of science essentially consists in the successive establishment of such general principles which rise one above another in higher and higher stage, until a few simple laws are found to explain and represent the wide range of phenomena to which they apply. But now mark, that while in this way knowledge is simplified, the mind is called into higher action. The abstraction of a common law from many facts, while it relieves the memory of the burden of a large portion of them, makes a greater demand upon the understanding. In proportion as knowledge is compressed in bulk, its quality becomes, as it were, more intense; and just to the degree to which this operation is carried, is greater intellectual effort required to master it. Thus in gaining command of the facts of nature and rising to a comprehension of the order of the universe, we are at the same time securing the highest and most salutary form of mental discipline; and a more of it, it may be added, for which the traditional system of culture makes no provision."

THE best quality of mind that any one can come in possession of is the strength to bear up against disappointments and misfortunes.

IN maliciously pointing out the faults of another person you only excite him to the discovery of your own.

AN EXTRA ROAR FROM THE "LION'S MOUTH."

Educational Advertisements.

The advertisements of educational establishments which appear in the San Francisco papers are often couched in shockingly ungrammatical language, but they are not quite so bad as the following which we clip from the Republican, Bridgeport, Conn., of March 15th, 1867.

$500 REWARD!

The above amount may be received for every six months' service in any business by

A YOUNG MAN

Who will attend from three to twelve months, Commercial College and Normal Academy of Poultney, Vermont.

This institution is now in a very prospering condition and may be which, with its other advantages, is one of the most delightful spots in New England.

THE

opportunities offered to the student to become a superior Penman at this Institution were never before equalled. We pay such attention to reading, Spelling, Compositions, Oratory and Grammar that no one need be a are invited to inspect our facilities, etc., etc.

We wonder if the Connecticut people advertise their religious services in the same style as they do their collegiate establishments. We should like to send a boy to that school. This style of advertisement may have been suggested by the fact that a young man was found dead in Poultney, who was an inmate of this Academy. Perhaps one of the masters having slaughtered a pupil in a fit of passion, bethought that he might turn his crime to account, and immediately after disposing of the body sat down, with Eugene-Aram-like coolness, and wrote this advertisement. A man who can advertise his school in such a style must be capable of any crime.

The Sprightly "Alta."

Since the return of the gentleman who did Paris and London thoroughly in three months; the gentleman who saw the Kohinoor diamond in among the crown jewels in the Tower of London, and asked if it was "real," and on being told by the chaffing "beefeater," "Oh no, that ou's a himitation 'er Majesty always keeps the boriginal in 'er pocket." believed it and gravely chronicled the fact in the Alta. Since the return of this gifted man our leading morning papers has become sprightly. An imitation of "The Lion's Mouth" has been started, under the title of "Editorial Notes." Fitz Smythe is allowed to go on with his fooling unchecked, and the Alta is now light and pleasant reading. We understand that shortly the auctioneers advertisements will all be published in rhyme and other improvements will be introduced. Lord! How travel does improve a man's mind. The Alta will shortly be as gay and sprightly as the Journal Pour Rire. Some matter of-fact persons will object to seeing the old grandame tricked out like a grizette with a lot of colored ribbons stuck in her venerable cap; but we enjoy it. Success to the gentleman from Paris and the humorist of the Pacific Coast, Fitz Smythe.

The Nobility of Nevada.

A letter from Unionville, Nev., to the Examiner, gives an account of a wheelbarrow bet. The correspondent says:

"Our celebration of your election on Tuesday last, was grand to all but the vanquished foe. Our District Attorney, who is a rampant Radical, a few days previous to the election made a wager with Mrs. O. K. Stamphy, a lady who is as good a Democrat as she is fair, that in the event of Haight's election, he would wheel her in a barrow wherever she desired to go. In the event of his defeat, she was to trundle him from the Humboldt Register office to the Exchange Hotel. Everything prepared, she stepped into a barrow and was covered two feet deep in American flags, by our sore but gallant son of Blackstone. Preceded by a band of music, and amid the booming of Democratic thunder from Captain Reed's Heavy Artillery, the procession moved up town."

We understand that as soon as Mrs. Stamphy was landed O. K. at the Exchange Hotel, she bestowed a title of honor on the District Attorney, that of noble barrowknight

Wandering Minstrels.

Every now and again one sees an advertisement offering a reward (generally $10) for the recovery of some missing Italian boy who has followed the occupation of street minstrel. The fact of the matter is, when these boys are brought to California by their "guardians," or owners, they speedily become too smart to work hard and give up all their earnings for their board and lodging. Raffaelo Piano offers $10 reward for the recovery of Giovanni Masini, aged twelve years, who formerly played the harp in the streets. We rather expect that Giovanni after playing the harp a year or two, determined to play the Piano and executed a rapid movement. We only hope that he will not come within reach of the piano pedals, having once succeeded in showing a clean pair of heels. TREM.

"Hari-kari," or "Happy Dispatch."

All Americans who have witnessed the Japanese carpenters at work in the Metropolitan Theatre, declare that if they are to be taken as samples of their race, the only occasion on which any of them show, in the whole course of their lives, any "happy dispatch," is when they are too lazy to live.

TEUTONIA SALOON.—This saloon has recently fallen into the hands of Messrs. Heinburg, Schroder & Co., who are also proprietors of the St. Louis Hotel, numbers 11 and 13 Pacific street. Under their management the Teutonia Saloon will succeed. They have a good location, and keep the best of Wines, Liquors and Beer. The close proximity to the new market will gain them a host of friends and patrons. The Teutonia is in the basement, southwest corner of Sumner and Montgomery streets.

JIM WOLF AND THE TOM-CATS.

BY "MARK TWAIN."

["Mark Twain," whose humorous sketches nearly all appeared in the columns of THE CALIFORNIAN, has been making that inveterate old story better. Simon Wheeler, of Angel's Camp, Calaveras Co., the narrator of the "Jumping Frog" story, relate another of his "reminiscences" for the public's entertainment. Here it is:]

I KNEW by the sympathetic glow upon his bald head—I knew by the thoughtful look upon his face—I knew by the emotional flush upon the strawberry on the end of the old free liver's nose, that Simon Wheeler's memory was busy with the olden time. And so I prepared to leave, because all these were symptoms of a reminiscence—signs that he was going to be delivered of another of his tiresome personal experiences—but I was too slow; he got the start of me. As nearly as I can recollect, the infliction was couched in the following language:

"We were all boys then, and didn't care for nothing, and didn't have no troubles, and didn't worry about nothing only how to shirk school and keep up a revivin' state of devilment all the time. Thish-yar Jim Wolf I was a talking about was the 'prentice, and he was the best heartcd feller, he was, and the most forgivin' and onselfish I ever see—well, there could n't be a more bullier boy than what he was, take him how you would, and sorry enough I was when I see him for the last time.

"Me and Heury was always pestering him and plastering hoss-bills on his back and putting bumble-bees in his bed, and so on, and sometimes we'd crowd in and bunk with him, not'thstanding his growling, and then we'd let on to get mad and fight acrost him, so as to keep him stirred up like. He was nineteen, he was, and long, and lank, and bashful, and we was fifteen and sixtecn, and tolerably lazy and worthless.

"So, that night, you know, that my sister Mary give the candy-pullin', they started us on to bed early, so as the corp'ny could have full swing, and we rung in on Jim to have some fun.

"Our winder looked out into the roof of the ell, and about ten o'clock a couple of old tom-cats got to rarin' and chargin' around on it and carryin' on like sin. There was four inches of snow on the roof, and it was frozen so that there was a right smart crust of ice on it, and the moon was shining bright, and we could see them cats like daylight. First, they'd stand off and e-yow yow-yow, just the same as if they was a cussin' one another, you know, and bow up their backs and push up their tails, and swell around and spit, and then all of a sudden the grey cat he'd snatch a handful of fur out of the yaller cat's ham, and spin her around, like the button on a barn door. But the yaller cat was game, and he'd come and clinch, and the way they'd gouge, and bite, and howl, and the way they'd make the fur fly, was powerful.

"Well, Jim, he got disgusted with the row, and 'lowed he'd climb out there and snake him off'n that roof. He hadn't reely no notion of doin' it, likely, but we everlastin'ly dogged him, and bully-ragged him, and 'lowed he'd always bragged how he wouldn't take a dare, and so on, till bimeby he hightsted up the winder, and lo and behold you, he went—went exactly as he was—nothin' on but a shirt, and it was short. But you ought to a seen him! You ought to see him cre-e-pin' over that ice, and diggin' his toe-nails and his finger-nails in for to keep from slippin'; and 'bove all, you ought to seen that shirt a flappin' in the wind, and them long, ridicklous shanks of his'n a-glistenin' in the moonlight.

"Them comp'ny folks was down there under the eaves, the whole squad of 'em under that ornery shed of old dead Washn'ton Bower vines—all sett'n round about two dozen sassers of hot candy, which they'd sot in the snow to cool. And they was laughin' and talkin' lively; but bless you, they didn't know nothin' 'bout the panorama that was goin' on over their heads. Well, Jim, he went a-sne-akin and a sneakin up, unbeknowns to them tom-cats—they was a swishin' their tails and yow-yowin' and threatenin' to clinch, you know, and not payin' any attention—he went a-sne-akin' right up to the comb of the roof, till he was in a foot 'n a half of 'em, and then all of a sudden he made a grab for the yallar cat! But my Gosh he missed fire and slipped his holt and his heels flew up and he flopped on his back, and shot off'n that roof like a dart!—went a smashin' and a-crashin' down through them old rusty vines and landed right in the dead center of them comp'ny people!—sot down like a yearthquake in them two dozen sassers of red-hot candy, and let off a howl that was hark f'm the tomb! Them girls—well they felt, you know. They see he warn't dressed for comp'ny, and so they left. All done in a second, it was just one little warhoop, and a whish! of their dresses, and blame the wench of 'em was in sight anywheres!

"Jim he was a sight. He was gormed with that bilin' hot molasses candy clean down to his heels, and had more busted sassers hangin' to him than if he was a Injun princess—and he come a prancin' up stairs just a-whoopin' and a cussin', and every jump he gave shed some china, and every squirm he fetched he dropped some candy!

"And blistered! Why, bless your soul, that pore cretur couldn't reely set down comfortable for as much as four weeks."

ONE OF THE ADVANTAGES OF ADVERTISING.—The advantages of advertising have just received a curious and amusing illustration in Boston. A wealthy gentleman of that city, who owns a country residence in the suburbs, became dissatisfied with it, determined to have another, and instructed an auctioneer for his descriptive powers to advertise it in the papers at private sale, but to conceal the location, telling purchasers to apply at his office. In a few days the gentleman happened upon the advertisement, was pleased with the account of the place, showed it to his wife, and the two concluded it was just what they would secure at once. So he went to the office of the auctioneer and told him that the place he had advertised was such a place as he desired, and he would purchase it. The auctioneer burst into a laugh, and told him that was the description of his own house, where he was then living. He read the advertisement again, pondering over the "grassy slopes," "beautiful vistas," "smooth lawns," etc., and broke out: "Is it possible! Well, auctioneer, make out my bill for advertising and expences, for, by George! I would n't sell the place now for three times what it cost me.

PERFUME.—The first perfumes were obtained by a combustion of aromatic woods and gums (hence the name perfumum—'through smoke')—and the first use primitive nations made of them was to offer them on the altars erected to their gods, perhaps with the mystic idea that their prayers would reach them sooner wafted on the blue wreaths of smoke, or for the less poetical purpose of counteracting the smell of the flesh burned in their sacrifices. Modern incense derives its sweet balsamic smell from benzoin (Styrax benzoin), which also formed one of the chief ingredients in pastilles and fumigating papers.

CLEVER INVENTION.—Somebody in Paris has constructed an apparatus, which not only marks on a dial the distance traveled by a cab, by means of an index worked by the rotation of the wheels, but it also indicates the distance it would have run at five miles an hour during any time it may have been kept standing after the hiring has commenced.

A GREAT thinker has said that "egotism is an infirmity that perpetually grows upon a man, till at last he cannot bear to think of anything but himself, nor even to suppose that others do."

ONE of the theatres in Paris has the following announcement placarded outside:—"You are requested not to bring children, who, from their age, are incapable of appreciating the talent of the artists."

A MAGNIFICENT DISPLAY OF SILKS.

ALL the world has lately been reading about the wonders of the Exposition Universelle of Paris. The highest achievements of art and taste and skill among all the nations of the Earth were there collected and displayed. All nations lent their choicest productions. But the French being at home determined to be unsurpassed and therefore excelled all their previous efforts. The products of their looms were the admiration and the envy of all their rivals. Especially was this the case in the way of dress goods, silks, satins and other fabrics for ladies' wear. The enterprising and wealthy firm of Meagher, Taaffe, & Co. took especial pains to be represented there by a gentleman of taste and discretion, whose especial duty it was, regardless of expense, to secure for the ladies of California a fair share of the choicest and most recherche of the articles in their peculiar line that might be created for the occasion and by the earliest and most rapid means of conveyance to dispatch them to their magazin in this city. That portion of the public most interested in such matters were aware of the fact and for weeks past have been on tiptoe of expectation of their arrival. On Friday the steamer arrived, and the announcement was made in the daily papers that it brought the expected invoices, and that the magnificent establishment of the Messrs. Meagher, Taaffe, & Co. would be thrown open to the public on that and the succeeding evening for the examination of these magnificent goods then to be for the first time displayed. The announcement was not unneeded. From early evening until a late hour the ladies with their escorts came in bevies to feast their eyes upon the rich display of splendid goods.

To us also the temptation was irresistible. Casting aside all our other engagements we determined to embrace the opportunity offered and see for ourselves what the artizans of France had exhibited as their latest and choicest achievements.

The splendid establishment with which all our fair readers are so familiar was light as day, and everything was exhibited to the greatest advantage as only the affable and accomplished assistants there know how to arrange such goods. We beheld the most brilliant display of fancy dress silks ever exposed to view at one time in this city. This is saying a great deal, but we know that every one of our fair readers who enjoyed the treat will fully bear us out in our assertion. Those who did not, need not take our remarks upon trust. Let them go there and see for themselves. The goods are there. They speak for themselves. They were not then offered for sale. In their eagerness to gratify the curiosity and taste of the public these gentlemen had hastened to display the goods without even stopping to mark them or fix the prices. They are therefore still on hand, and during the present week will be first offered to purchasers.

Most of the goods displayed were from the looms of Lyons, of the styles and patterns worn almost exclusively by her Majesty, the Empress of the French, ever since the commencement of the distress lately prevailing among the ouvriers in that district. Certainly many of the pieces exposed were worthy of being worn by any Empress. They may therefore be expected to satisfy the most exacting of our fair San Franciscans. They were principally intended for evening and dinner dresses. The chine silks were the most numerous. A pattern of Vest Isly silk with large chine figure in green, or green with a slight mixture of lis d'vin entirely new in design, at once attracted the attention of all the lady visitors as they approached. Their expressions of admiration and delight were marked and decided, and they lingered long before it. A pearl gray chine, beautifully marbled in colouer de feu, irresistibly attracted the attention and elicited the admiration of all the guests, and well it might. The salesmen duly appreciating its beauty had made it the centre-piece of the arrangement. It was the only one of the kind imported. Who shall become its envied possessor? A pale gray chine, having a remarkably neat wild flower pattern of a darker tint of the same color, also elicited the praises of the ladies, as the taste displayed in its creation was indeed exquisite.

A white gros grain embroidered with blue and silver fluxias was also much admired, as well it might be, for anything more striking, and yet in perfect taste, could not well be conceived. A pattern of embroidered silver rose buds on plain gros de Paris grounds of all colors, pearl, pink, lilac, etc., were all tenderly gazed on and admired with longing eyes. One poulte de soie pattern, a plain white ground with a gold embroidered flower, was truly regal in its magnificence, and is destined to adorn one of our fairest and brightest. The name—but no—it is yet a secret we will not betray. A beautiful Jacquard pattern with a broad blue stripe upon a plain white ground and climbing flowered figure between, was never passed without expressions of admiration and intense desire to possess it. A blue gros de Nap embroidered with pansies, and the same patterns in other colors, never failed to attract the attention it well deserved. A full assortment of plain gros grain silks of all colors, suitable for street dresses, were duly admired by all the numerous visitors. The Bismarck colors, now all the mode in paris and throughout Germany, concerning which a warm debate arose as to whether our grandmothers would have styled them a cinnamon or a golden brown, were also carefully inspected and much admired. The corn colors bouton d'or and glacé silks pleased those who preferred lighter colors. The Moire Antique and Renaissance silks came in for a full share of attention and admiration.

The heavy satins in green, bronze, Bismarck, lilac, pearl, and a variety of other colors, next caught the eye, and the display in this line was alone worth the visit.

Improving the opportunity the fair visitors hastened next to inspect a fine disply of laces. One set in Point de Venise, over an eighth of a yard in width, fairly covered with the most delicate flower and leaf tracery, excited the covetousness of all who approached that department. Nothing equal to it had heretofore been exposed for sale on this coast. Some of the richest sets owned in San Francisco were mentioned and their fortunate possessors named, but none approached this in elegance of design and perfection of execution or, most important of all, in value. Band, collar and cuffs! How they were ever suffered to leave Paris we cannot imagine. There is nothing like having an agent who knows how to accomplish such results, and this enterprising firm have secured one. Single collars were exhibited worth anywhere from seven to seventy-five dollars.

Elegant Chantilly lace flounces valued at from fifteen to fifty dollars per yard, Point de Venise collars and sleeves worth from ten to a hundred and fifty dollars, and Lama and Yak lace shawls and circulars worth from twenty-five to eighty dollars each, also fairly bewildered the delighted visitors, who could readily believe the fact that the silks and laces before them represented the snug little fortune of one hundred thousand dollars.

Neither did the elegant camel's hair shawls from seventy-five to six hundred dollars, or the Paisley shawls sold at from twenty-five to four hundred dollars fail to receive the attention they so richly merited.

A large variety of new styles of robes, among them the Grande Duchesse, and cashmere sacks of the most exquisite patterns, from the famous looms of Steinbach, Kœchler & Co., of Mulhouse and Paris, with beautifully colored explanatory designs showing the styles in which they are worn and their appearance when made up, were carefully examined by the ladies, each of whom, it was easy to see, made her selection and determined to possess it when the day of sale arrives.

The variety of merinos, dress goods, ottoman-ve-loars and striped and plain poplins was wonderful in itself.

The elegant opera cloaks of the newest patterns, one in particular of fine white cloth with neat pearl colored satin trimmings, were also duly praised and admired. The full assortment of French, English and Balbriggan hosiery in cotton, Silk and thread work, was carefully inspected and attracted much attention, as the present style of short dresses renders care in the selection of these articles of ladies wear much more important than heretofore.

The married ladies we noticed did not fail to observe the extensive assortment of Barnsley, Irish, Scotch and French linen goods for shirtings and bed and table use, and meatally determined where they would go hereafter in case of necessity to replenish that portion of their household stores.

But every reader knows that the half a mile of shelves in that extensive establishment are always full, and that nothing that is needed for use or display is ever wanting there. The mere enumeration of what we saw would fill our columns. Our readers, therefore, need not fear that we will attempt it. It was the silks we went to see, and to write about. We saw them, and if our affable conductor had supposed we had half a thousand dollars in our pocket which we meant to leave there, he could not have been more considerate and attentive. If we have not said enough concerning them, let our fair readers each appoint herself a committee of investigation, and proceed to examine them for her own satisfaction.—Golden Era of September 15th.

MUST BE TORN DOWN.—The brick building on the northeast corner of Washington and Kearny streets, originally occupied by Palmer, Cook & Co. as a banking house, and for the last eleven years occupied by Holcombe & Bros. and Holcombe & Kast, as a boot and shoe store, is going to be torn down, and in a short time the cars will be running over its present site; then thousands of ladies in passing over the spot where "Holcombe's" once stood, will remember the great shoe emporium of the city with pleasure, when they recall all the nice pretty-fitting little boots they used to get there. Holcombe & Kast are now selling off their fine stock, and now is the time to lay in a supply of boots for the winter. The present prices of their goods are far below wholesale value; for instance they are now selling Benkert's boots for $7 50, old price $12 00, and all other goods in proportion. The same quality of goods will probably never be offered in this city again at the same prices.

INDIA RUBBER PAINT.—Epes Ellery has obtained a patent for an excellent article under the above title, that partakes of the nature of a liquid cement as well as paint, and is superior to anything of its kind in use. Persons about to have houses painted or roofs repaired should post themselves about Ellery's patent India rubber paint, which is made by dissolving gum-elastic and other gums in boiling linseed oil, and afterwards adding the color. One coat of this is better than two of common paint, and a number of those who have used it prefer it to any other kind of paint. It is especially good for all roofs, ships' decks and sides, oil-clothing, and iron. It has been used extensively in the Eastern States and gives great satisfaction, and also by many San Franciscans, to whom persons interested can obtain reference. The office is No. 226 Jackson street.

CLOSING OUT.—Mrs. Swift, 203 Kearay street, one door south of Sutter, is closing out her stock of millinery goods and made up hats at very low prices. Mrs. Swift will dispose at wholesale of her entire stock at a sacrifice: especial inducements will be offered to the city or country trade; what hats there are made up will be sold at retail at very low figures. This affords an excellent opportunity for ladies to procure new style hats at great bargains.

THE NIGHT BEFORE THE MOWING.

All shimmering in the morning shine,
And diamond with dew,
And quivering in the scented wind
That thrills its green heart through—
The little field, the smiling field,
With all its flowers a-bowing,
How happy looks the golden field
The day before the mowing!

All still 'neath the departing light,
Twilight, though void of stars,
Save where, low westering, Venus hides
From the red-eye of Mars;
How quiet lies the silent field
With all its beauties glowing;
Just stirring—like a child asleep—
The night before the mowing!

Sharp steel, inevitable hand,
Cut keen, but kind! Our field
We know full well must be laid low
Before its wealth it yields;
Labor and mirth and plenty blest
Its blameless death bestowing;
And yet we weep, and yet we weep
The night before the mowing.

WHY JACK HARPER NEVER GOT MARRIED.

"A FINE looking woman, Jack!" said I. "Who is she?"

We were sitting at the open window, Jack and I, looking idly out at the crowd pouring up and down the street, in the afternoon sunshine. A lady, tall, stylish, handsome, had glanced up in passing bowed to Jack with a brilliant smile, and swept on.

Jack Harper (he is a fine fellow, Jack, and remarkably good-looking) looked at me with an odd little smile.

"Yes," he said, "she is a fine-looking woman, and the wife of my very good friend. I dined there yesterday, and kissed the baby, after dinner. They are the happiest couple I know of."

There was something peculiar in Jack's tone and smile that made me look at him. He noticed the stare, and answered it.

"Hewitt," he said, "you asked me the other day why I never got married. I did not tell you then; but I shall now, if you feel in the mood to listen. It is not much of a story; but, such as it is, you are welcome to it."

"Fire away!" said I. "Let's have a cigar and a story, by all means!"

Jack began, in a regretful tone, and enlightened us with the following narrative:

We were at school together, and sworn chums always. Fred was intended for doctoring, and I for lawyering; so we went our respective ways up the steep hill of life, and didn't meet for as much as three years after our parting at college. I was a idle lawyer, taking life very lazily; and Fred, more fortunate and more energetic, was a made man already. He had settled in Blackfield, the grimiest and dirtiest of manufacturing towns, and a splendid field for an ambitious young doctor. Fred was perpetually urging me to run down and stop a few weeks, just to talk over old times. At length I consented, and took train for Blackfield.

About sunset I reached the town. You have never been in Blackfield, Hewitt, I suppose? Of all the dirty, smoky, noisy, nasty towns I ever set foot in, I can safely say Blackfield is the dirtiest, smokiest, noisiest, and nastiest. Fred was rich enough, and had good taste enough to eschew the town and live out in the shrubs, in a cosy, old-fashioned country hotel, with green fields and waving trees, and pretty country houses all around. Fred was away when I arrived, making his afternoon round of professional calls; so I dined in solitary state, and then loitered out to look at the sunset and smoke a cigar. Whilst I loitered up and down, the still evening-hush was broken in upon by a sudden storm of music. There was a very large, white house opposite, its windows all wide open, and some one in one of the rooms was playing and singing. It was no small treat to so ardent a lover of music as myself, to lounge there in the misty twilight listening to the melody of that clear, soprano voice.

"You play uncommonly well, madam," said I to myself, "and I am exceedingly obliged to you. As a parting favor I wish you would have the goodness to show yourself at the window."

By Jove, Hewitt! Before the thought had well crossed my mind, there she was! She came over to the open window, lifted the blind, and stood looking out. The prettiest girl, Hewitt—blue-eyed, brown-haired, rose-cheeked, and altogether lovely. In one minute my fate was sealed; in one minute I was head and ears in love. I cannot account, to this day, for the suddenness of the attack. It might have been something in the country air. It might have been the playing and singing. It might have been the bright, piquant face, Heaven only knows! but my doom was sealed instanter. Presently the blue eyes strayed in my direction. I don't know what she read in my face, but she blushed beautifully, and beat a precipitate retreat.

I think I was in a sort of a trance from that until Fred came, during which I stood and stared at the house over the way. I have only a vague memory of Fred's impetuous rush up-stairs, of having both hands shook until my arms ached, and of being asked a thousand questions in a breath, not one of which I comprehended in my dazed state. My first intelligent recollection is of inquiring who lived in the house opposite.

"Who lives in the house opposite?" repeated Fred, staring. "You had better ask who does not live there! It's the Garden of Eden, my dear fellow; that's what it is."

"I know it," said I; "but who is the proprietor of the garden?"

"Miss Bongtong, and Miss Lucille Bongtong, two maiden-sisters of a certain, or rather uncertain, age. The place is the famous Blackfield Academy for young ladies."

"Then she must have been one of the young ladies! Fred, I have seen the loveliest girl, and the most perfect pianist, this evening, that I ever came across in the whole course of my life."

"I don't doubt it," said Fred, cooly. "They're a crowd of lovely girls, and all play the piano to a charm. What was she like, this particular one? I go there pretty often, and I know them all."

"You go there, do you?"

"Yes, professionally. Describe the young lady you saw, and I will tell you her name."

"I can't describe her. She is indescribable. She is too perfect for words to do her justice."

"Well, you are pretty far gone, at first sight, Harper!" said Fred, staring at me. "Suppose I help you out. Was she tall or dumpy?"

"Dumpy!" I cried, indignantly, "She was tall and slender—as perfect of form as of face."

"And her eyes? She had eyes, I suppose? Were they black, blue, grey, or green?"

"Blue!" said I, enthusiastically; "and as bright as the stars of heaven. Brown hair, and cheeks like blush-roses. There, you have her!"

"Blue, brown, and blush-roses," Fred said, thoughtfully. "That description applies to a round dozen of Miss Bongtong's pupils. I rather think, though, your divinity is known in every-day life as Miss Isabel Hooper. I had the pleasure of prescribing for her, last week, for a sore throat."

"Fred," said I, you'll give us an introduction, old boy, won't you? You're a lucky fellow to have the run of such a place as that."

"All right," said Fred. "But don't be too sanguine if it turned out to be pretty Issie. She is the wickedest little flirt that—well, sir, what do you want?"

The question was addressed to a boy in the street below, who had hailed my friend.

"It's Miss Bongtong, if you please, Dr. Marks. Her compliments; and Miss Pritchard's got neuralgia in her head, and would you come over and see her, she says?"

"Tell Miss Bongtong I'll be there in five minutes. Now, Jack, old fellow, I'll find out who your piano-playing divinity is."

"I wish I could go with you," said I. "Can't you pass me off as a professional friend from town, of infallible experience?"

But Fred wouldn't, and went whistling over the way, to the paradise where my angel dwelt. I still stood on the piazza, staring at that particular window from which the bright face had looked, hoping intensely that it would appear again. Fred was gone nearly an hour, and I was getting impatient, when the front door opened and he came out. He was talking to some one—a lady—neither so young nor so good-looking as she once had been, but still passable, and most youthfully dressed. I saw then both look over at me, then the lady retired. Fred made his best bow, and recrossed the street.

"Well," said I the moment he joined me. "Did you find out my young lady?"

"I have found her. It is as I thought, Miss Isabel Hooper."

Isabel! My blue-eyed divinity had a name as charming as her face.

"Have you been speaking to her?" I inquired, carelessly lighting a cigar.

Fred nodded, and lit another.

"I met her in the lower hall as I entered, and stopped her to inquire if she had been practicing in the parlor that evening, and serenading my friend on the opposite piazza. You should have seen how she blushed, old boy."

"Fred, introduce me."

"With the greatest pleasure. Are you badly in love with her, do you think?"

"Pshaw? In love with a bread-and-butter-eating school-girl! But she is uncommonly pretty, and a flirt, you tell me, and I should like a flirtation of all things down here to pass time."

Fred gave me a sidelong glance, and smoked away rather savagely.

"Issie's a good little girl," said Fred, after a pause "and an heiress, by the by, too. You might do worse than make her Mrs. Harper."

"When will you give me the introduction?"

"Let me see," Fred said, thoughtfully. "I am in Miss Bongtong's good graces; she escorted me to the door this evening, and can fetch any friend I like to visit the school. I'll ask permission to take you over to-morrow; and when I get you there I will present you to my cousin Alice and half a dozen more of the demoiselles, Miss Hooper among the rest. But, mind you, don't put your foot in it by being attractive to her the first minute. If you do, Miss Bongtong will show you the door."

"Forewarned is forearmed," said I. "I will play the devoted to Miss Bongtong herself, and so secure the entrée."

Fred voted the idea a capital one; and I retired that night to dream of Isabel's blue eyes, and to hear her entrancing music again in my sleep.

Fred went to see after Miss Pritchard's neuralgia immediately after breakfast, and returned with a radiant face. Miss Bongtong had given him leave to bring his friend; and he had encountered Miss Hooper, and told her he was going to fetch over the gentleman she had bewitched the previous evening, to be introduced.

"No! Did you tell her that?" said I. "What did she say?"

"Looked saucy, and made a saucy speech in French, and walked off to her music lesson. I don't think she is displeased, though; and she is going to a party to-morrow night, where you can flirt to your heart's content."

"Where is the party to be?"

"At my aunt's. Cousin Alice, of course, will fetch Isabella, and you come under my especial charge. It's a pity you only want a flirtation, pour passer le temps, for Issie's the best and prettiest girl in the world."

I thought so myself, and when Fred went away to see his patients, I took my seat at the window, to watch the house over the way. The piano was jingling all morning; sometimes the playing was torturing to hear; but I stood it all in hope of seeing my divinity. I was rewarded just before Fred's return; and just as I was yielding to despair, the azure eyes and rose-bloom face appeared at the window, looked my way, blushed, and vanished.

I don't think I ever took so much pains with my toilet before going to a fashionable ball, as I did that afternoon before proceeding over the way. I thought myself I was irresistible, and Miss Bongtong seemed to think so too, for my reception was most flattering. I don't know what that villain Fred had been telling her; but she simpered, and dipped, and looked at me under her eyelashes, in a way that rather disconcerted me at first, and which tickled Fred beyond everything. The two long rows of pretty girls up in the class-room were all in a flutter at our entrance; but I never looked twice at any of them, for there was my blue-eyed angel, and how could I see any but herself?

Fred was a great pet with the two Miss Bongtongs—as handsome young doctors are apt to do with elderly young ladies—took the liberty of presenting me to some of the pupils, "Cousin Alice, Miss Moore, Miss White, Miss Brown, Miss Isabel Hooper." I had been bowing mechanically hitherto, but I now looked up and into Miss Hooper's fair face, and the blue eyes dropped, and the rosy light was there again most delightfully. There was no chance of talking—Miss Bongtong seemed rather in a hurry to get us out of the class-room, and enjoy our society herself in the drawing-room. I did my best to fascinate her, and she permitted herself to be fascinated without the slightest demur.

"I suppose we shall have the pleasure of seeing you to-morrow night, Miss Bongtong?" Fred asked, as we arose to go.

"At your aunt's? Yes, certainly. You and Mr. Harper will be there, of course?"

"Of course. Mr. Harper could not stay away if he tried," laughed Fred. "Come, Jack, Miss Bongtong is dying to be rid of us."

Miss Bongtong protested she was nothing of the sort; and upon my word, I believed her. I got a cordial invitation to call again, and departed in the light of Miss B.'s most radiant smile."

Once again that evening I caught a glimpse of my brown-haired Isabel, at the window. This time I had the privilege of bowing, and received a bow in return, which might have turned the head of an anchorite. How I longed for the evening party, and when it came how elaborately I arranged myself in purple and fine linen, and set off with Fred for his aunt's house.

We were a little late—Fred's fault—and everybody seemed to have arrived before us. I was led down the drawing-room, and presented in due form to mine hostess, but all the while my eye was wandering around in search of the magnet that had drawn me there. And, yes! there she was, bewildering in white muslin and pink ribbons, and just taking Fred's arm for a waltz. That was a pleasant sight; and, to improve matters, up stepped Miss Bongtong, simpering more than ever. There was no getting rid of her; I had to ask her to dance, and had the satisfaction of seeing Fred and his pretty partner laughing at the figure we cut. I knew they were laughing at the figure we cut. I knew they were laughing at us; and

I could have shot Fred, and seen Miss Bongtong at Jericho at that moment, with the greatest pleasure.

At last my turn came. I shifted Miss Bongtong over to Jack, asked Miss harper to dance, and led her off at once. I did more; I kept her with me nearly all the rest of the evening, and flirted, as Fred had told me, to my heart's content. I found Miss Issie understood the art of flirtation to perfection, and looked saucily at me out of those adorable blue eyes of hers. But, Hewitt, it wasn't all flirting on my side: I was in love with her, beyond a doubt, and was in the seventh heaven. if not further, all that memorable night. When we parted, in the pale, gray dawn, I had a rose from her bouquet in my buttonhole, permission to fasten her mantle, and press her hand at parting, and went to sleep the happiest man in creation.

After that night, I found there was no leaving Blackfield. The place had became paradise all at once, and I was bound there as fast as if my hotel was a prison, and chains of iron held me. To simply say I was over head and ears in love, is a mild way of putting it. I was no longer a responsible being, but went about in a state of harmless imbecility, with only one idea in my head, and that idea—Isabel!

I saw a good deal of the darling girl. She appeared at the window very often now, and I met her in the town, at the houses of mutual acquaintances, and at the school. I went over the way pretty often. Miss Bongtong was always gracious, but she kept me out of the classroom as much as possible. I had found out, by this time, that Isabel was as good as she was pretty. I found out, too, that I did want a wife, and made up my mind to propose, the first opportunity.

The first opportunity at another party, given by Fred's aunt. Miss Bongtong and her pupils were there; and Isabel, as usual, looked too lovely for description. I was her most devoted, hanging on her every word, and all that sort of thing and only waiting for the right chance to speak. She was saucy, as usual, and the blue eyes were too laughingly bright, and did not droop half often enough, I thought. She was leaning lightly on my arm, as we stood listening to Fred singing some absurd song, and my Isabel laughed at it more than I really saw any need for.

"You don't like comic songs, surely?" I said.

She looked at me with one of her bright, saucy glances.

"Yes, I like everything Fred sings!"

"Fred?" I repeated, turning cold suddenly, "Pardon me, Miss Harper—may I ask what particular interest you take in Doctor Marks?"

She laughed up in my face, with a bright, defiant glance.

"It ought to be a particular interest," she said, gaily, "since I am to be married to him in three months. How surprised you look! Why, we were engaged before you came here. Good-by, Mr. Harper; our flirtation must come to an end—Miss Bontong won't like it!"

Fred had told her, then! Ten minutes after, I was back in my hotel packing up. I found a triangular note on my table, in a lady's hand when I entered. It was from Miss Bongtong, demanding my intention. I sat down at once wrote and despatched this answer:

"Dear Madam,—I have no intentions what ever.

Yours, respectfully,

J. Harper."

Before Fred returned from the party, I was flying along in the cars back to town. I have never been back in Blackfield, and I have never been in love since. The lady you saw passing an hour ago is Mrs. Fred Marks née Hooper, and they came here to reside about a month ago. I dined there, yesterday, and kissed the baby, and we were all very happy together, but somehow I felt like the fox looking at the grapes beyond his reach.

Its Value and Utility.—Mrs. Anna Maria Spooner, 38 Bond street, Brooklyn, gives her opinion of the value and utility of the Grover & Baker Machine for family use as follows: "I believe it to be the best, all things considered, of any that I have known. In the first place, it is very simple and easily learned; the sewing from the ordinary spools is a great advantage; the stitch is entirely reliable; it does ornamental work beautifully, and the embroidery stitch; it is not liable to get out of order; it operates very easily. I suppose I can sum it all up by saying it is a perfect machine. I have had occasion to compare the work with that of other machines. The result was always favorable to the Grover & Baker Machine."

How Counterfeiters are Detected at the Bank of England.—When a counterfeit is presented at the Bank of England, the gold is instantly paid for it. If it comes from some known person he is only asked where he got it. If from a stranger, the cashier signals to his detective, always in waiting and the officer follows secretly. Before many hours the bank is in possession of the person's biography. The offender once arrested, is likely to be tried, convicted, and sentenced within two days; wherefore Great Britain is not an inviting field for that branch of industry.

WILLIAM HOGARTH.

"WHO is dis Hogart?" said George II. to the nobleman who had brought a print of the famous "March of the Guards to Finchley" for his Majesty's inspection and approval. "A painter, my liege," answered the courtier. "Bainter!" exclaimed the king. "I hate baiuting, and boetry, doo! neider de one nor de oder ever did any good. Does de fellow mean to laugh at my Garts?" "The picture, an please your Majesty," meekly responded the nobleman, "must undoubtedly be considered as a burlesque," "What? a bainter purlesque a zoldier! He deserves to be picketed for his inzolence! Dake his drompery out of my zight."

Such were, in the year of grace 1750, the royal notions about those things which go so far in elevating the thought and purifying the taste of a people; and the anecdote, which is a true one, indicates, as fairly as any single circumstance which could be cited, the deplorable stato into which everything pertaining to fine arts had fallen. Since the revival of letters, England, in poetry, had been able to hold her own against all comers; and Shakespeare had as much to do with the making of England as any king that could be named. The acted drama had set in at Drury Lane, under the management of David Garrick, a very great reform; and the actor's former tutor, the great Dr. Johnson, rejoiced to see > —the reign commense

> Of rescued nature and reviving sense.

It was reserved for William Hogarth to redeem his country from the shame of being sensible to art only through the works of the alien. France and Spain, Holland, Germany, and Italy were long generations ahead of England, and had hitherto supplied her with all her art wants; but henceforth she is to have a school of her own, and William Hogarth is to be regarded through all future time as its founder.

Let us answer, then, the royal questiou with which this paper opens: Who is this Hogarth?

William Hogarth was born on the 10th of November, 1697, in Ship Court, Old Bailey, where his father, a reputable scholar, and come of a goodly yeoman family in Westmoreland, kept a school. About the usnal age, the boy, having shown a disposition for drawing, was apprenticed to a silversmith and engraver of arms. He had completed his term of service in 1720, the year in which Law's Mississippi scheme exploded and our own great South Sea bubble burst; at all events, in that year he commenced business on his own account, and to his wonderful skill with the graver he very soon added the higher art of the pencil. "Owing," says Hogarth, "to my desire to qualify myself for engraving on copper, and to the loss which I sustained by practical copies of some of my early and most popular prints, I could do little more than maintain myself until I was near thirty." This would make a second term of service to the arts: the first seven years, until he was about twenty-three, was his apprenticeship and the second seven his probation. The peculiar bent of his genius began to show itself during the latter period, and the designs he executed for the book-sellers, more especially those to illustrate "Apuleius" and "Hudibras" attracted the attention of those interested in art. He tried his hand, too, at portraits, going at his subjects with all the directness of his own nature, and painting the truth as he found it. From that time forth the allegorical vagaries of Verrio and his like fled the Island, and English portraiture became complimentary to common sense.

Hogarth for some time attended the Academy of Sir James Thoruhill, serjeant-painter to the king; and if he did not acquire much practical knowledge of art there, his attendance would appear to have opened the way to something equally important, viz., a good wife. In his thirty-third year Hogarth married Jane Thornhill, aged twenty-one, and as the parents were not consulted, he was for some time, with Sir James, at least, in disgrace. Our artist now took a house in Leicester Fields, addressed himself with fresh vigor to his art, and determined to support his young wife in a position worthy her rank and education. Writing of this time, he says: "I married, and commenced painter of small conversation pieces, from twelve to fifteen inches high. This having novelty, succeeded for a few years. But though it gave somewhat more scope for the fancy, it was still but a less kind ot drudgery: and as I could not bring myself to act like some of my brethren, and make it a sort of manufactory to be carried on by tho help of backgrounds and drapery painters, it was not sufficiently profitable to pay the expenses my family required." If money, however, did not come in very fast, and his price for portraits at this time was something very insignificant, his reputation, at least, was increasing. It was about this period that he designed and etched the first portion of The Harlot's Progress, and Lady Thornhill was so pleased with it that she advised her daughter to place it in her father's way. "Accordingly, one morning," says Nichols, "Mrs. Hogarth conveyed it secretly into his diuing-room. When he rose, he inquired from whence it came, and by whom it was brought; and when told, he cried out: 'Very well! very well! The man who can make words like this can maintain a wife without a portiou.' He designed this remark as an excuse for keeping his purse-strings close; but soon after became both reconciled and generous to the young people." From this time forward the fame and fortune of William Hogarth went on increasing, and the genius of the man was allowed on every hand.

"The reasons," says he, "which induced me to adopt this mode of designing were, that I thought both critics and painters had, in the historical style, quite overlooked that intermediate species of subjects which may be placed between the sublime and the grotesque. I therefore wished to compose pictures on canvas similar to representations on the stage; and further hope that they will be tried by the same test and criticised by the same criterion. Let the decision be left to any unprejudiced eye; let the figures in either pictures or prints be considered as players, dressed either for the sublime—for genteel comedy or farce—for high or low life. I have endeavored to treat my subjects as a dramatic writer; my picture is my stage, my men and women my players, who, by means of certain actions and gestures, are to exhibit a dumb show."

The brisk, lively, inquiring nature of William Hogarth, as well as his own art predilections, led him to mix with all sorts and classes of people; and the poorer orders, who appear to have been an altogether neglected and down-trodden section of the community, were peculiarly amenable to hi spencil; but, unlike Morland, he never brought away with him any moral taint from the haunts of the vicious, and he managed to draw instruction and warning from the shortcomings of the high as well as the low. The terrible scourge of his satire, and the genial outflow of his humor were felt by all; and a more daringly outspoken man, or a more conscientious and original artist, England has not seen since his time.

The best of all Hogarth's works, his Marriage a la Mode, is in the National Collection. The Enraged Musician shows with what happy invention he could work out a grotesque idea. It was intended as a companion to the print representing a Distressed Poet. Hogarth was always happy and at home in the streets of London, and we see here with what fidelity he could utilize the sights, and even sounds of ordinary every-day life. As an artist his drawing was not what is called academic and elegant; bnt so far as the truthful rendering of objects and their expression goes, he was unrivelled. His sarcasm reminds one of Swift, whom he greatly admired, and the furnishing of his interiors appropriately has only been equaled in our own day, and that by a master in the sister art of prose fiction. We allude to Charles Dickens. We find the best summing up of Hogarth's person and character in the pages of Allen Cnnningham:

"He was rather below the middle lize; his eye was peculiarly bright and piercing; his look shrewd, sarcastic and intelligent; the forehead high and round. An accident in his youth had left a scar on his brow, and he liked to raise his hat so high as to display it. He was active in person, bustling in manner, and fond of affecting a little state and importance. He was of a temper cheerful, joyous and companionable; fond of mirth and gnod-fellowship; desirous of saying strong and pointed things; ardent in friendship and in resentment. His lively conversation—his knowledge of character—his readiness of speech and quickness of retort—made many court his company who were sometimes the object of his satire; but he employed his wit on those who were present, and spared or defended the absent. As to license of his tongue, he himself often said that he never nttered that sentence about a living man which he would not repeat gladly to his face. As to his works, he always felt conscious of their merit, and predicted with equal openness that his name would descend with no decrease of honor or posterity. He loved state in his dress, good order in his household, and the success of his works enabled him to indulge in the luxuries of a good table and pleasant guests." "In his relati.. of husband, brother, friend and master," says Ireland, "he was kind, generous, sincere and indulgent; in diet abstemious, bnt in his hospitalities, though devoid of ostentation, liberal and free-hearted, not parsimonious, yet frugal; but so comparatively small were the rewards then paid to artists, that after the labor of a long life he left a very inconsiderable sum to to his widow, with whom he must have received a large portion."

After an active life of sixty-seven years, the great father of the English school of painting died on the 26th of October, 1764, at his residence in Leicester square, and was buried in the churchyard of Chiswick. On his tombstone his friend David Garrick has inscribed the following lines:

> Farewell, great painter of mankind!
> Who reached the nobleat point of art,
> Whose pictured morals charm the mind,
> And through the eye correct the heart.
> If Genius fire thee, reader, stay;
> If Nature teach thee, drop a tear;
> If neither move thee—turn away;
> For Hogarth's honored dust lies here.

Physiology is a true science. The man of profound thought, the man of ability, and, above all, the man of genius, has his character stamped by nature; the man of violent passions and the voluptuary have it stamped by habit.

ENDORSING IMPERTINENCE.

It seems not a little strange that a journal of the grade of the Bulletin should lend its columns to such silly impertinence and old-womanish twaddle as the communication in its Thursday's issue, on "Sunday Recreations," addressed "To the Right Rev. William Ingraham Kip, Bishop of California," and signed 'Episcopalian.' The standing of the Bulletin is such as to give a certain sort of consequence even to such a specimen of feeble garrulity as that to which we are alluding, and for this very reason that paper should be all the more careful in regard to the character of the communications to which it lends a species of endorsement by publishing them. Had "Episcopalian" (the assumption of which signature in this instance we strongly suspect, from internal evidence, to be a false pretence) been content to discuss the abstract question of Sunday Recreations, without any personal references, there could not, of course, have been any objection to its publication, provided it was judged worth the space it would occupy. But "Episcopalian" evidently was less concerned with the question itself, than with the Bishop, whom he addresses personally in a strain of vulgar familiarity which furnishes presumptive proof that he is not in the habit of holding intercourse with bishops or other dignified personages, otherwise than through the medium of impertinent anonymous epistles. No, it clearly was not so much for the purpose of enlightening the public on Sunday Recreations, that he rushed into print, as it was to enjoy the luxury of alternately lecturing and patronizing a bishop. Every one has observed the mania of a certain class of officions, fussy busy-bodies for writing "open letters" to public men during the excitement of political campaigns. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, these productions are inspired by vanity or malice; for without the operation of these incentives, the personal form would not have been suggested, and the point at issue would more naturally have been discussed in the ordinary way, without a resort to the snobbish assumption before the public of intimacy and equality where they do not exist.

The whole tone of the communication in question, is to say the least, in very bad taste, being characterized by a certain complacent assumption, and an air of didacticism that would better become a very learned pedagogue instructing a very backward pupil, than 'an Episcopalian" addressing his Bishop through a secular paper, on the subject of the soundness of views propounded in a Pastoral Letter. The communication opens with a gracious endorsement of the Bishop's "character," designed apparently to show that though "Episcopalian" feels called upon to set his diocesan right on the subject of Sunday Recreations, and to condemn his opinions as unsound, he does not mean to impeach his personal respectability. "With feelings of none but the sincerest respect for your character," etc., commences "Episcopalian," "I come to discuss the "Pastoral Letter recently issued by you," etc. Having thus majestically atronized his Bishop, he in the same stately strain expresses his entire approval of the ordinances of his Maker, so far at least as "the Sabbath" is concerned. "No one," he says, "is more favorable to a decorous and religious observance of the Sabbath than the writer;" "I regard it as one of the most beneficent of the Divine ordinances, showing the love of the Maker for his creatures." So far, all goes smoothly enough. The Bishop's character is endorsed; the "Sabbath" too, is approved of in a general way, and Divine Providence is complimented on the "beneficence" of the ordinance. But this pleasant condition of things cannot last. "Episcopalian" has set out to confute and instruct his diocesan, and in entering seriously upon the task, the gracious tone thus far employed, must be exchanged for one more austere and authoritative. "I take issue with your statement," etc.; "I think you do injustice not only to," etc.; "I am with you, in your condemnation of the Saturday night ball," etc., "but I cannot follow you in your so general denunciation of Sunday picnics;" "I will concede that in the abstract it would be as well," etc.—an amiable relapse into the gracious vein once more. The matter of the communication corresponds to its manner and taste. It is inconsequent in arrangement, crude and sophomorical, and presents nothing bearing the remotest resemblance to an argument. Destitute as it is of any intrinsic worth or interest to redeem its feeble egotism, no influential journal should have contributed to lend it a certain sort of borrowed consequence, by publishing it, least of all, by publishing it in the ill-chosen, if not offensive form of personal address, selected by the writer.

"IS SPIRITUALISM TRUE?"

THE Colorado papers contain the particulars of a "discussion" that came off not long ago, at Central City, we believe, between Mrs. Laura De Force Gordon, and the Rev. Mr. Crawford, the question for debate being stated in the brief formula, "Is Spiritualism true?" We are not advised what course the discussion took, and we confess ourselves quite at a loss to form even a probable conjecture from the terms in which the issue is expressed. Before the question, "Is Spiritualism True?" can be intelligently discussed, it would seem to be necessary that "Spiritualism" should be defined with something like logical precision, a thing that has never yet been done, so far at least as we are aware. Does Spiritualism consist in a belief in the existence of disembodied spirits? If so, all Christians, and nearly the entire religious world, are Spiritualists, and will unhesitatingly take up a position on the affirmative side of the question. Does it consist in a belief in the possibility of spirit intercourse, and that spirits have, and still do, at times hold intercourse with mortals? Then a very respectable body, both of the ancients and moderns, are Spiritualists. This belief has been held in all ages, and in many countries. The Romans believed that Cæsar's spirit appeared to Brutus, and warned him of impending doom on the plains of Philippi. Doctor Johnson devoutly believed in the Lock Lane Ghost And there are to-day, as there always have been, innumerable persons, ordinarily characterized as "superstitions," whose faith in apparitions is immovable. Yet this faith has not been associated with any knowledge or acceptance of the vague and undigested doctrines and ideas which the Spiritualist teachers are pleased to dignify with the name of their "philosophy." Or does Spiritualism consist in a belief that tables tip, and that raps are produced upon them under certain conditions? If this is so, we are "Spiritualists;" for we have witnessed the "phenomena," as have multitudes of others, some of whom believe that they are produced by imposture and jugglery, while others, as Charles Beecher, Dr. Huntington, and many of the Roman Catholic clergy, insist that like the prodigies of the Egyptian soothsayers, and the responses of the ancient oracles, they are the work of demons; still another class being inclined to seek a solution in the operation of natural laws and forces, as yet imperfectly understood, and which are a proper subject for the investigations of physiology and psychology.

But we cannot suppose that in proposing to discuss the issue stated in the terms of the title of this article, Mrs. Gordon meant simply to hold the affirmative, and Mr. Crawford the negative of the proposition that "Spiritualism is true," in any of the senses of the word which we have above given. Mr. Crawford did not mean to deny the existence of spirits; nor is it at all probable that his opponent would have been satisfied with the bare admission that tables are rapped and tipped by the means employed by professed jugglers and thaumaturgists, or that the phenomena are produced by demons, or that they are the result of the operation of natural powers acting according to fixed laws, and without the intervention of spirits. Mrs. Gordon would scarcely, we think, apply the term "Spiritualist" to an individual professing to hold either one of these hypotheses. What then was the meaning attached to the term by the disputants, and what did they, in fact, propose to discuss? What was it that the lady, as the champion of her sect, meant to maintain to be "true," and what was it, the "truth" of which Mr. Crawford held himself ready to dispute? The question is, to us, not a little perplexing; and the only conjecture remaining, after rejecting all those hazarded above, seems to be, that it was the truth of the doctrines and teachings of the Spiritualists, of their "philosophy," or their "beautiful faith" that was designed to be the subject of the discussion.

But if such was the case, the disputants must have found themselves confronted with an insuperable obstacle to anything like precise and logical argumentation, in the fact that the "doctrines" of Spiritism, the dogmas that constitute the creed or articles of belief of the "beautiful faith," have nowhere been authoritatively set forth. There is no volume, accepted by sect at large, in which they are to be found. In fact, there is no community of belief among the spiritists themselves, and no concordance or homogeniousness in the teachings of their leading Apostles. The doctrines preached by the lecturers and taught in their organs are often conflicting, and sometimes directly contradictory. Every lecturer, and "investigator" has his, or her own peculiar notions as to what is sound spiritist doctrine; and the animus by which they are inspired seems to be widely different. Some talk like ribald and scoffing infidels of the most vulgar school, and delight in nothing so much as in assailing Christianity and ridiculing its teachers. Others, like Judge Edmonds, speak reverently of the religion founded by Christ, and most respectfully of its ministers. The writings of their chief hierophants do not contain any system of views that can justly be called a philosophy at all. Indeed, none of them have given the world anything that approximates to a system. Some of them write like men of shallow minds and morbid sensibilities who had become intoxicated by too copious draughts from the fountains of German mysticism. The "philosophy" of others is a mosaic of ideas stolen from Swedenbourgh, Theordore Parker and Frances Power Cobbe. So far as their ideas on the subjects of the human soul, a future life, the relations of men to each other, duty, progress, and sociology generally, are concerned, they have certainly derived nothing whatever from the spirits. They have advanced nothing that is new, nothing that some seer like Swedenbourg, some profound and abnormal genius, like Jacob Behmen or Jean Paul Richter, some "progressive thinker" like Parker or Newman, some grand and exalted intellect inspired and purified by the sacred and unselfish "enthusiasm of humanity," like the Italian Mazzini, some spiritual minded clergyman, emancipated from the bondage of his traditional creed, like Martineau, Maurice, Ballou, or Bushnell, had not already discerned without the aid of any other spirit than that which works impartially in all pure souls that hunger for the truth. All the wordy rhapsodies, and pretentious "philosophy" of the spiritists, claimed to be derived from the unseen world through their "mediums" and inspired "revelators" are but a paltry patchwork of thoughts and ideas plundered, and generally spoiled in the plundering process, from men such as we have named, men who without the machinery of "seances" or table-tipping, in the normal exercise of their own intellectual and spiritual powers, have given to the world great thoughts and ideas, expressed in noble and fitting forms, such as neither Davis, nor Fishbough, nor any other of the spiritistic hierophants has yet succeeded in clothing his patchwork pilferings in.

If then, by the question, "Is Spiritualism true?" it is meant, are the "faith and philosophy" true, as set forth in the spiritistic literature, and by the spiritistic lecturers and mediums, if this is what is meant, the inquiry simply amounts to this: "Are all the fragmentary and heterogeuious odds and ends of thought and speculation, which Davis and the lesser lights of the "beautiful faith" have plagiarized from a thousand different sources are these, in the mass and aggregate to be accepted as a 'philosophy' and as the truth?" How Mrs. Gordan and her Rev. antagonist managed to conduct the discussion of such an issue, in a manner at all satisfactory to themselves or edifying to their hearers, we repeat, we are quite unable to imagine; and we are equally unable to conceive how the question, "Is Spiritualism true?" can ever be the subject of intelligent discussion, until some clear and accurate definition of "Spiritualism" shall have been determined upon.

Woe to the Jewelers.—We fear that the goldsmiths and silversmiths of Paris, and perhaps of the rest of Europe and of the United States, will howl, as did those of Ephesus, headed by Demetrius—"Our craft is in danger"—if the latest fashion in watches and jewelry attains much favor. There is a furore is Paris for a new style of watch at the present moment. It is large, made of ebony, and ornamented at the back with the initials of the owner in silver, or else with fanciful arabesques. The dial plate, which is small, is surrounded by a thick circle of ebony, the fingers and hours being in silver. This watch hangs from an ebony chatelaine, the rings of which are ornamented with silver, and joined together either by bars or balls of silver, according to the pattern of the chatelaine. There is an attempt to introduce brooches and ear-rings in the same style, but they are not yet adopted. As to the watches, they are to be seen at the waistbands of all the elegantes, especially when they wear the inevitable fancy black dress.

Another "Libel" on Alexandre Dumas.—Poor Alexandre Dumas! Since that horrid photograph of him in his shirt-sleeves with Adah Isaacs Menken etc., etc., etc., etc., etc. in his arms appeared we think he might be free from further "libel." But alas! people believe with Salem Scudder, "the apparatus caan't lie," and the pictures, many of which have reached San Francisco and caused much merriment, were generally pronounced genuine. Therefore another "libel" is going the rounds of the press. It is contained in the following paragraph:

Dumas, pere, is said to be engaged upon a new novel, the scene of which is laid in America, the time being that of our civil war. It is understood that many of the details and incidents have been furnished by the eccentric equestrienne, Adah Isaacs Menken Heenan, or whatever else her name may be.

Five Years in Japan.—The arduous duties of Mr. Maitland during the present week as Interpreter to the newly arrived Japanese, have precluded the possibility of his furnishing No. VI of the series of papers which we have published under the above title; it will appear in our next issue.

"The Progress of Mankind."—This is the subject of a lecture to be delivered this evening at Lincoln Hall, by Professor Vellmiro, who enjoys a high reputation as a thinker and a scholar. We believe the lecture is repeated on this occasion by request.

Another Paper.—It is rumored that the friends of Geo. C. Gorham have raised the sum of $200,000 for the purpose of starting a paper, of which he is to be editor. If this be true, he will be consoled for losing the Governorship.

BASILICA.

BY A. G. BIERCE.

WITH aimless feet, along the verge
Of ocean, where the rocks emerge,
I strolled, and watched the baffled surge.

In sheltered channels at my feet,
The sleepy ripples crisping neat,
Slid in and out with sluicy heat.

The groaning sea, wind-smitten white—
The day, shot through with throbbing light,
Lay palpitating on my sight.

From bloody death of stricken day,
And ocean's leprous agony,
My weary eyes I drew away,

To where the rocks the margin mar
Of waters where the shadows are—
And saw the smiling of a star.

Imbedded deep in mossy green,
A glinting gem with lustrous sheen,
Burnt wondrous with a flame serene,

My soul grew drunken with its ray—
Like liquid April filling May,
Its wing-light suffused the day.

And day became—with colors cold
New-drowned in beauties manifold—
An opal chalice brimming gold.

A silent music clove the air—
A spirit bent in worship there—
My wish had wrought itself a prayer.

"O, if thy beauty, radiant stone,
Be not rejected love alone,
By wooing skies upon thee thrown;

But rather a desire intense,
Appealing thus to human sense
With more than human eloquence;

If so thou strivest to impart
The aspirations at thy heart—
Pulsing a wish with every spark;

Give me to claim thy sacred ray,
I'll bear the from thy shades away,
And set the in the perfect day.

I'll niche thee in a shrine made fair
With wondrous woods and metals rare,
And dim with amber-tinted air.

And sculpted work of quaint device,
Gem-tinct with gleams of prismic ice—
And lamps antique of fabled price—

And droning troops of monkish bees,
With censers filled at spicy trees,
Shall minister on bended knees."

Grey darkness fell upon the land,
With hasty clutch my eager hand
To snatch the gem from barren strand

Essayed. When, Lo! with stiffened hair—
And vision smit with baleful glare—
And hope sharp-freezing to despair,

With heart compressed as in a vice,
And forehead bound with sudden ice—
I grasped a hidden Cockatrice.

O, with Heart of Stone with eyes of light,
And ivory throat of pallid white,
And snaky folds concealed from sight,—

With jeweled teeth, alas! and breath
Whose touch to passion ministreth—
Sweet-spiced with aromatic death!

No pen of poison, gall-immersed,
Of deadly sins can name thy worst;
Or fitly curse thy race accursed.

San Francisco, Sept. 16th 1867.

CALIFORNIA SCENERY AT THE EAST.—Bierstadt's picture of Yo-Semite has been on exhibition for nearly a year past in New York city; and was recently removed to Boston to give the denizens of the "Hub" a chance to feast their eyes with its grandeur and beauty. The Bostonians were not unappreciative. The Saturday Evening Gazette says: "Bierstadt's great picture, 'The Domes of the Yo-Semite,' continues to attract great attention. Its visitors and admirers are numbered by thousands notwithstanding the dulness of the weather. It is a great picture delineating one of the grandest scenes in Nature, and is well worthy the study of all."

INCENDIARISM.—Unless more circumspection is exercised by our local insurance companies as to the character of the parties whom they insure, a grand crash is inevitable. The New York and London companies have taken alarm and debarred a certain class of migratory foreigners from the benefits which they offer to honest people. In San Francisco, such a course of proceedings is eminently necessary, as many persons who come here find it more profitable to destroy than to produce.

ANOTHER LONDON MAGAZINE.—The "New Metropolitan Magazine" is the title of the new monthly to be issued under the editorship of Mr. Anthony Trollope. The first number will appear in October.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE old saying runs "good wine needs no bush," but it occasionally becomes the duty of the Press to call the attention of the public to the fact that it is losing much pleasure in not witnessing a dramatic performance of sterling merit, which is, however poorly patronized. There is no need to do this in the case of the performance of Dan Bryant at Maguire's Opera House. The flow of Irish spirit by which the young comedian delights so many nightly, needs no commendation to prolong its attractiveness. Night after night the Opera House is crowded to its utmost capacity. Irish comedy is the rage at present, and Dan Bryant is the most popular of actors. On Monday, the drama of Shamus O'Brien was produced to an overflowing house, many persons being unable to obtain even standing room. The play went off very well; it abounds in pathos and humor, and has many beautiful scenes and striking situations. Dan Bryant's make up in the roles of "Owney Dugan," "Danny Doyle," and "Thighecn O'Leary" was very good, and his acting throughout was much applauded. Mr. McCullough was quite at home in the character of "Sir Derry Downs," and the villain of the piece, "Corney Ryan," was well played by Mr. Edwards. Miss Sallie Hinckley, who has of late played every part committed to her in excellent style, performed that of "Kate O'Connor" charmingly. Miss Olivia Rand acted the role of "Mary Kennedy" with great spirit, and sang "Shamus My Own" very well. D. C. Anderson made a fine old priest as "Father Malone," and delivered his blessings most impressively. Willie Edouin displayed much talent in the part of "Miles O'Halloran," and brought down the house by his execution of an Irish jig. The piece was put on the stage in excellent style with new scenery and stage effects. This afternoon and evening Shamus O'Brien will be played.

On Wednesday evening John Brougham's play of The Bells of Shandon will be produced with new scenery, music and new stage effects, including a beautiful waterfall scene with real water.

On Monday a new attraction was offered at the Metropolitan Theater. A large audience was in attendance to witness the first appearance, since his tour through the interior, of Joe Murphy, the Ethiopian performer and Irish conedian. The performance commenced with the farce of The Mischievous Nigger, in which Joe Murphy caused roars of laughter by his impersonation of "Anthony Snow." After this, Harry Jackson sang his original local song, "The Organ Grinder's Wager," which was published originally in last week's CALIFORNIAN; this was received with much applause and laughter. Joe Murphy then sung his famous song, "The Pretty Octoroon," and in response to an encore gave his clever impersonation of a darkey, Lord Dundreary, and afterwards performed a fantasia on the bones. Miss Emma Howson and Henri Herberte sang a duet from The Amber Witch beautifully, and the performance concluded with the capital Irish extravaganza of The Happy Man, in which Joe Murphy appeared to good advantage as an Irish comedian in the character of "Paddy Murphy," and sang "Pat Malloy" and "St. Patrick's Day" in excellent style. In this piece Miss Clelia Howson played "Ko-ket" in a charmingly naive and graceful manner and looked bewitchingly pretty. A similar entertainment was given on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday evenings. Last night the house was closed in order to afford an opportunity for the great preparations necessary to be made before the appearance of the great Haa-ya-takee Troupe can take place. On the same account there will be no performance either this afternoon or evening.

The great Haa-ya-takee, the acrobat, is devoted to his profession. He considers the art of balancing the most noble one in the world. Indeed, he says, on this all the present system of creation depends. What would happen if the myriads of spheres which compose the universe were unequally balanced as regards mutual attraction? Chaos! What would happen should the members of the great Haa-ya-takee troupe perform without sufficient rehearsal and preparation? One or two of them would probably lose their balance and perhaps break their necks. Haa-ya-takee cares not so much for this—all the performers declared their willingness to appear in an unprepared condition arose not from fear of death. "If we break our necks," said they, "it is not our faults, the management must be responsible." No, it was not the risk of dislocating more or less Japanese vertebræ that caused the leader of the troupe to refuse to allow them to appear until they had fully rehearsed their performance. It was because he feared some act might be performed clumsily. Said Haa-ya-takee to the management: "You wish me to sacrifice my reputation in order to draw a crowd to your house. Never! If you must have a crowd, if you will drive me to desperation, I will fill the house for you. Advertise that I will, on a certain evening, perform a novel and strange feat, and I will on that evening, on your stage, commit harakeri and thus save my professional honor."

The carpenters of the troupe have been working night and day, and I suppose the members of the troupe, including the great Haa-ya-takee himself, have not averaged per man since their arrival, more than three hours sleep during the twenty-four hours. J. H. Vinson, the indefatigable stage manager, has since the arrival of the troupe slept standing, five minutes at a time, and in addition to this has engaged in deadly conflict with Japanese carpenters.

The preparations at the Metropolitan theatre are really on the grandest scale. A new stage has been built, and as we go to press the finishing touches are being put to it. It is possible that a rehearsal for the Press may be given on Sunday evening. The Haa-ya-takee troupe will appear on Monday evening, or else their leader will commit hari-kari. He has given his word. Those who witnessed the other Japanese performances would be astonished to see the immense paraphanalia which the Haa-ya takee troupe consider necessary in order to preserve their well earned reputation of being the troupe of Japan. I have seen enough myself to convince me that the former troupes were as like to this as I to Hercules.

TOUCHSTONE.

BENEFIT OF MME. STELLA BONHEUR.—The performance of La Figlia del Reggimento at the American Theatre on Wednesday evening last, for the farewell benefit of Mme. Stella Bonheur, attracted a crowded and extremely fashionable house. The beneficiary was unfortunately laboring under severe illness, and it was only her extraordinary force of will, aided by the skill of her physician, who was behind the scenes during the whole evening, that enabled her to go through with the performance. Her success in the role of "Maria," therefore, though very creditable, and in the last scene really brilliant, must be taken as but a faint indication of what she might have done when in perfect health, and a full command of her voice. The part of "Tonio" was very well sung by M. Charles, who kindly undertook it on account of the indisposition of Signor Carmini Morley. The character of the old sergeant "Sulpizio," was capitally rendered by Signor Mancusi. The performance as a whole was tolerably good for a benefit night, although in a regular season a little more precision would have been expected. We trust that Mme. Bonheur will be heard at least once more before her departure.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—Nothing can exceed the beauty of these gardens at the present season of the year. The numbers of flowers and fine shrubs give the grounds a charming appearance. The numerous works of art to be seen in the art gallery, the thousands of curiosities, and the museum and many interesting animals on exhibtion combine to make this a most interesting spot.

The money taken to-day will be given to the San Francisco Benevolent Association, therefore those who vist these Gardens will have the additional pleasure of knowing they are aiding a most valuable charity. A fine instrumental concert will be given.

THE CITY GARDENS.—Many gallant young watermen, who do not care to risk themselves amidst the tides and currents of the stormy Bay, enjoy a pleasant row on the lake in these delightful grounds, the ladies enjoy a game of croquet, and all are pleased to inspect the zoological collection, walk through the conservatories, saunter along the shady pathways, and enjoy a chat in the pleasant summer-houses.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—A number of new models have been added to this already very complete collection. A periodical visit to this institution will be found of benefit by many who, from a want of knowledge of the structure of their bodies, violate the laws of nature.

ACCORDING to an eminent French Physician, a cold in the head can be cured by inhaling hartshorn. The inhaling should be through the nose, seven or eight times in five minutes.

THE German residents in China have sent Count Bismarck a testimonial in the shape of a silver goblet, five pounds in weight, and thickly gilted on the inside. On the cover is a bust of the minister.

[Translated from the German of Ludwig Boerne, by Daniel E. Bandmann.]

SHAKSPEARE'S SHYLOCK.

THE play was ended. The ladies came home and told me that the actor who represented Shylock was called before the curtain; that he thanked the public in the customary way; and, among other things, stated that such an inhuman monster as Shylock was never to be found in real life. I then deemed it fortunate that a severe cold had prevented me from witnessing the performance. But, possibly, the soft words of this philanthropic actor was prompted by a good-natured impulse. Many rich Jews reside in this city (Frankfort,) who are hated and worried by their fellow Christians; and, as this stranger had ministered to the malicious pleasure of the Christian populace by producing "The Merchant of Venice" on the occasion of his Benefit, he wished, after all was over, to say something pleasant to the Jews, who also largely helped to crowd the theatre. If, however, he really meant what he said, he proved his ignorance of the character that he had assumed to interpret. It matters little whether or no there be Jewish anthropophagi and vampires, but it is very important that we reject the erroneous idea that the great poet wished to hold up a mirror for Jews, into which everybody could look for a shilling—just as they can at the dog Badowsky.* When Heaven sends a prophet like Shakspeare to an ignorant world, it commissions him not merely to teach us how to read. Shakspeare's mission was neither to preach nor to teach: and, if ever he did desire to act the schoolmaster, it was to the Christians and not the Jews that he addressed the lesson of the "Merchant of Venice." Due respect to Shylock's Judasm! a morality that despises all trivial passions. But there is something grand and sublime in his nature, which looks down with haughty scorn upon his own meanness. Shylock is an exalted Jew and an avenging angel. He has reached such a height of sensibility that he is capable of doing a magnaimous deed—not in the way of mere usury, to increase his gains, but for the benefit of mankind. He desires to revenge his abused and down-trodden race, upon its tormentors, the Christians. We despise in Shylock the devil of avarice; but the distressed and suffering man we pity; and we admire and even love the avenger of inhuman persecution. Let no one think that the Jew wishes merely to get a pound of flesh from the breast of a Christian. Cruel in mind he may be, but he is never cruel in heart. He has a soft and tender nature; he is pitiful; he cannot bear the sight of blood. Who can say that Shylock would really have executed his threat? Who knows but that the knife, which he had so malignantly sharpened on his sole, would have fallen at last from his avenging hand? Antonio might safely have risked the ordeal—if we read aright the character of Shylock. We do not forget the sacrifice that he is willing to make to his revenge. Three thousand, six thousand, nine thousand ducats! and the Jewish ducats are not the common ducats, but ducats of greater value. In Jewish eyes, too, they are more precious because they are Jewish. Shylock will give all, and more than all—that profit which, to the Jew, is more than possession—for his revenge. He has trusted to the god's of vengeance, to the wild winds and the cruel sea; and they have not deceived him. Nor must we be misled by Shylock's saying that he hates Antonio—

> For that, in low symplicity,
> He lends out money gratis, and brings down
> The rate of usance here with us in Venice.

Shyluck did not hate Antonio for that. The Christian mercantile and commercial world of Venice, surely, was not composed of only good and noble Antonios; and one man, be he ever so rich, cannot reduce the value of money. No; Shylock is a Jew; he feels a secret shame in sacrificing money to a phantasy; he wants to excuse his conduct to himself—and the excuse that he finds is couched in the words we have quoted. He does not persecute the foe of usury in Antonio: but the foe of his faith he persecutes, and in his feverish infatuation he sacrifices wealth to an airy fancy. The actor who would personate Shylock may herein find the key to the character. The blood-thirsty hatred of the Jew shou'd terrify us, as every mad fanaticism naturally does; but Shylock must not be so interpreted as to awaken disgust and aversion, as does a loathsome bodily disease. Shylock's execrable avarice, and the spasms into which self-interest hurls his soul, may revolt us; but the Jew must not herein be made ridiculous. In the presence of a very demon it is no time for laughter. Now, to show us the god in the demon, to pass through a desert of sin wherein, not far distant, murmurs concealed a well-spring of love—this, surely, is a sufficiently hard and great task for the actor. Shakspeare, unlike common men and common poets, who desire to make everything pleasant to their feelings and conformable to their notions of art, does not mingle elements like a chemist, representing clear characters, these lovely, those hateful, these attractive, those repulsive: this Shakspeare never does. He sides with no party. He ascribes the palm only to virtue. He lets his characters quarrel among themselves, and never mingles in the quarrel. He has explained the nature of the Jew's hatred of the Christian, and, equally, laid bare the springs of the Christian's hatred of the Jew. Why should not Shylock hate Antonio—hate him the more for his very nobility? Antonio is a good, noble, generous man—but not to the Jew. Him he abuses at all times. Even at the very moment of asking his aid, he can not conceal his contempt for Shylock. The good, the noble Antonio, who is willing to sacrifice everything upon the altar of friendship, cannot even speak a kind word to the Jew. After all this, a scapegrace of a Christian runs away with Shylock's daughter; and she, intending to become a Christian, enters upon conversion by despising her father because he is a Jew. Such injustice, such cruelty might well convert the nature of a dove into that of a dragon. In his hatred of the Christian, Shylock reveages upon himself insulted virtue. He throws away money to avenge his race, and he learns and teaches that gold is not, as the Jews would have it, the monarch of the world, but that love is mightier than avarice, even in a Jew.

Whenever I read Shakspeare it grieves me that he does not live in our age, to make it clear to us. Events seem unreal, when the great master is wanting, to state them to us in a great manner. A character which that great poet has not described to us, because it was unknown to him, is like a book without a title, that we must read before we can know its subject. It often happens that great periods have no great historian, nor poets, nor artists, capable of worthily describing or representing them. The great events are too grand, too restless, or too busy to pose quietly before common artists. These can but briefly snatch their outlines, or must wait till the time be dead, in order to make a lifeless cast. But, before an artist like Shakspeare, times stand still, well knowing that nature owes its immortality to art. How would Shakspeare have described our Shylocks, the great Christian Shylocks with badges of their order upon their gaberdines? How would he have described those paper flying Shylocks, without gaberdines, who hold in notes the flesh and blood of nations, and who do not make paper out of rags but rags out of paper? How would he have portrayed those profligates to whom God is a minister of Finance, who said, "Be created," and lo! there was a world of paper; Adam the first banker; Paradise a blessed place of State papers; the Fall of Man the first fall of stocks; The Day of Judgment an ultimatum? A Shakspeare would have unveiled the mysterious ways of these brokers of exchange between nature and art, who stake the gold of the one against the paper of the other. What did that Venetian Shylock do? He gave three thousand ducats for a poor pound of Christian flesh. That at least was dearly bought. But our Shylocks demand, for one small eighth, entire Hellas. Yet the soft-spoken actor could say, here in Frankfort, that a monster like Shylock does not exist in nature, and Shakspeare is a slanderer. Ah, my dear friend, histories lie if they call men Christians because their ancestors ate pork; but Shakspeare never lies.—N. Y. Weekly Review.

* This learned animal's performances made a great sensation all over Germany, and it is recorded that the beast was the indirect cause of Goethe's resigning the position of manager of the Weimar Theatre.

WILKINS ON DOGS.

BY JOHN QUILL.

I MUST get the landlord to change my room. It is excessively disagreeable to be compelled to overhear the conversation that takes place between Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins in the room next to mine every night. I loose my natural rest, and then it doesn't seem exact the thing, anyhow, for me to listen to such family talk as this, that I heard during the small hours this morning.

"Not one more cent will I spend for advertising, Mrs. Wilkins, not one more cent. If the dog don't come back now, why let him stay away, and that's the best thing he can do anyhow in my opinion."

"But just this once, Wilk——"

"Not another time, I tell you. Do you want to ruin me? Do you want to make me break myself up for an old bow-legged dog, who absolutely ain't worth a second-hand postage-stamp? Not much, I guess. I ain't a going to do it, I can tell you, so you just might as well shut up about it."

"But, John, we may get him this——"

"Get him!—get him, yes, you will; you'll get him; why didn't you get him the last time you advertised? Why didn't you get him, instead of having about a million swindlers coming to the house with a million bull pups—black and tans, pointers, and setters, and red, black, yellow, brown, white, and flea-bitten dogs, and each man swearing that his dog was the one, and wanting me to give them the five dollars reward. Five million dollars, Mrs. Wilkins! five million dollars for dogs! I guess you don't know the value of money. You think I am a rich man, don't you? Five million dollars for dogs! why you're crazy; shut up and go to sleep, and give me more covers."

"But there wasn't anything like a million, Mr. Wilk——"

"Yes there were; you can't count; there were two millions if there was a dog, and if I ever have them coming round in my front yard again you may shoot me."

"Don't loose your temper, John, I——"

"But I will lose it, I tell you. It's enough to make any man lose his reason to be tied to such a woman as you are, a woman who is plotting his destruction and trying to blast his hopes—blast his hopes, I say, for that's what you are doing, Mrs. Wilkins, reducing me to a skeleton, too, by your misconduct. It would drive any man mad to think that his wife cherished a secret passion for that big man in a fur cap, who made a pretense of bringing around that bull dog, so that he could get me outside and set him on me, and have me chawed up and made a mangled corpse before your eyes, while you sat in the window and gloat over it and winked at him. Its an outrage against decency, Mrs. Wilkins; but you've met your match."

"Mr. Wilkins, you shan't talk——"

"Now, don't try virtuous indignation with me, it won't do. Don't deny it, for I watched you and saw you make signs to that fellow. I'll shoot him the next time I see him, if I don't my name ain't Wilkins."

"Now, John, be calm; you know how much the children want the dear little dog brought——"

"Yes, I do; they want him back, don't they? Amelia Matilda wants him brought back so that he can chaw up all her doll babies again and choke himself to death with the saw-dust, the child revels in that, don't she? And I suppose William Henry wants him back to fly at him and scare him and tear great slices out of his pants, and to run away with his tin velocipede and smash it up? Pshaw, Mrs. Wilkins, you talk wildly, I don't want to bother with you."

"You know the dear children loved him."

"I don't know anything of the kind. Do you call it loving a dog for Breckenridge Augustus to fight him with Jones' big blood-hound, who slit his ear and bit off his hind leg, or to put carpet tacks in his beef and have him howling around the house with the cholic for a week? I don't call that loving him, I don't think that shows the children are fond of him any more than it did when Holofernes Montgomery hacked off his tail with the mince-meat chopper, and then tried to graft a skate strap on to the stump."

"Oh, Mr. Wilkins, he didn't do—"

"On to the stump, while William Henry put him in a starch-box and liked to suffocated him by burying him while they were playing funeral."

"Wilkins, how can you—"

"Funeral; don't interrupt me? Does that look like loving him? Why they hate him, and so do I; for I never saw a more worthless dog in my life. Who'd give a cent for a dog that would stand and look at a rat as stupid as an owl, and never budge until the rat left, and then would go and smell around the place and look brave, while all the time he was scared half to death. Blame such a dog, I say, and you want me to offer five dollars for him so you can have a chance to see that blackguard in the fur cap. If I do, hang me—there now."

"But, John, the dog-catchers may get the poor dear—"

"I hope they will, I'll give any dog catcher five dollars who would put his fingers on that dog and butcher him. That's what I want—I want them to take him up and strangle him and smash his head in, and chop him up. Sausage, Mrs. Wilkins, do you hear? that's what he'll come to, and I hope you'll have to eat it, then maybe you'll get enough of him, you're so fond of him. But you needn't come fooling around me with any of it, I won't eat it; I ain't fond of dog meat, if you are. Now go to sleep, I'm tired of hearing you cackle."

"Mr. Wilkins, you're too aggravating to live. I've got a great mind to go and sleep down stairs."

"Yes, I knew it—I knew it—and meet that dog man with a fur cap and run away with him, and desert me and your nine innocent children. O, very well, go on, I know you ain't satisfied; I know you don't love me; no woman who loves a man ever wants him to advertise and spend five dollars for a confounded old dog."

"As long as you're so excited about it, Mr. Wilkins, I'll tell you a secret—"

"I don't want to hear any of your secrets. Go tell them to the fellow with the fur cap and the dog."

"Secret about our dog—"

"I don't want to hear it, I tell you—"

"You needn't advertise for him."

"What?"

"You needn't advertise for him—he's all right."

"You don't mean to say—"

"I can find him."

"What do you mean, Mrs. Wilkins?"

"Oh, You don't care for the dog, so never mind."

"Tell me what you know this minute."

"Well, then, he's—but no, you'll kill him."

"Mrs. Wilkins, if you don't tell me what you know about that dog there will be a first-class riot in this room."

"Well, if you must know, I've—but no—"

"Sold him, have you? Bully for you—"

"No I haven't sold him, for he isn't in the cellar."

"Well I hope I may—you don't mean to tell me that infernal cur is in our cellar?"

"Yes, he is"

"Then that settles it. You and I can't live together any longer. Any woman who would trifle with her husband's feelings in that manner ain't fit to associate with decent people. Don't you ever speak to me again; I don't want to have anything more to do with such a systematic old Sapphira as you are."

And Wilkins slammed the door as he went out, and I found him next morning sleeping on the sitting-room sofa. But he made it up with his wife, for I saw her that afternoon sewing a patch on his trowsers while he was shaving himself and accusing her of trying to cut her corns with his razor.—Philadelphia Sunday Transcript.

BABBITTONIAN,

OR SELF-TEACHING

PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put up in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

THE BRIDAL.

BY A DECIDEDLY CONFIRMED BACHELOR.

Not a laugh was heard, nor joyons note
As our friend to the bridal we hnrried;
Not a wit discharged with his farewell shot,
As the bachelor went to be married.

We married him quickly to save his fright,
Onr heads from the sad sight tnrning;
And we sighed as we stood by the lamp's dim light,
To think him not more discerning.

To think that a bachelor free and bright,
And shy of the sex as we found him,
Shonld there at the altar, at dead of night,
Be caught in the snare that bound him.

Few and short were the words we said,
Thongh of wine and cake partaking;
We escorted him Lome from the scene of dread
While his knees were awfully shaking.

Slowly and sadly we marched adown
From the first to the lowermost story,
And we never have heard from or seen the poor man,
Whom we left alone in his glory.

How Doth the Little Busy Bee?—A few days since a hive of bees was being conveyed throngh Winchester, Mass., in a cart, when the cover of the hive was by accident shifted. The bees in escaping became enraged and stnng the driver of the cart, and he being enraged in turn, turned the hive into the street, where the bees stung a number of passers-by, who fled in all directions.

Socrates used to say to his friends that his wife was his greatest blessing, since she was a never-ceasing monitor of patience, from whom he learned so much within his own doors that the crosses he met elsewhere were light to him.

"Young man, do you believe in a futnre state? "In conrse I doz; and what's more, I intend to enter it as soon as Betsey gets her things ready."

Opposites frequently go together; chills and fevers are generally associated.

To Epicures.—There is considerable difference between a gourmand and a gourmet. In the gourmand the animal natnre predominates, while the gourmet cnltivates the sense of taste nntil it is ren. dered snsceptible of receiving the highest gratification. The gourmand is satisfied to swill flat beer or sonr wine, to eat ill-cooked viands, provided he can get enongh to gorge himself withal. Epicures, or gourmets, who can appreciate the delicate bonquet of a fine wine as they delight in the perfume of the violet, should pay a visit to the store of F. C. Belden, No. 612 Sacramento street, where they will find the rarest brands of wines, spirits and liqneurs, the choicest teas and an immense assortment of delicacics, such as truffles, pate de fois gras, Stilton cheese, caviare. etc.

AYER'S
AGUE CURE,
FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Billious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the billious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, and sold by all Druggists, everywhere.

WALKING A RAFT.

There was a fellow once stepped out of the door of a tavern on the Mississippi, meaning to walk a mile up the shore to the next tavern. Just at the landing there lay a big raft, one of the regular old fashioned whalers—a raft a mile long.

Well, the fellow heard the landlord say the raft was a mile long, and he said to himself, "I will go forth and see this great wonder, and let my eyes behold the timber which the hand of man hath hewn." So he got on the lower end and began to prcambulate over the raft in pretty fair time. But just as he got started the raft started also, and as he walked up the river it walked down, both going at the same rate. When he got to the end of the sticks he found they were near shore and in sight of a tavern ; so he landed and walked straight into the bar-room he had come out of. The general sameness of things took him a little aback, but he looked the landlord steady in the face and settled it in his own way.

" Publican," said he, " are you gifted with a twin brother, who keeps a similar sized tavern, with a duplicate wife, a comporting wood pile, and corresponding circus bill, a mile from here.

The tavern keeper was fond of fun, and accordingly said it was just so.

" And, publican, have you among your dry goods for the entertainment of a man and horse any whiskey of the same size as that of your brother's ?"

And the tavern man said that from the rising of the sun even unto the going down of the same, he had.

They took the drinks, when the stranger said : " Publican, that twin brother of yours is a fine young man—a very fine man indeed. But do you know, I'm afraid that he suffers a good deal with the Chicago diptheria ?"

" And what's that ?" asked the todd-sticker.

" It's when truth settles so firm in a man that none of it ever comes out. Common doctors of the catnip sort call it lyin'. When I left your brother's confectionery, there was a raft at his door which he swore his life was a mile long. Well, publican, I walked that raft from bill to tail, from his door to yours. Now I know my time, and I'm just as good as for a hoss, and better than any man you ever did see. I always walk a mile in exactly twenty minutes, on a good road, and I'll be busted with an overloaded Injun gun if I've been more'n ten minutes coming here steppin' over the blamed logs at that.

THE WILLCOX & GIBBS
SEWING MACHINES

Have taken over Two Hundred First Premiums within two seasons, including the Highest Prize at the grand trial

with the Florence at the great Union Fair, New York, at which trial the Florence was overwhelmingly defeated.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE

FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE

TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines ; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the " BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner ; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful ; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the " Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

ON COURTING.

BY JOHN QUILL.

When you go courting a girl, never pay much attention to the old lady if she hangs around. You can marry a woman without her mother's consent, but if the daughter ain't agreeable you will experience considerable difficulty.

When you are alone with a girl in the dark, and you feel like putting your arm around her, always skirmish a while to ascertain where she sticks her pins, or you may tear the skin off of your fingers. It will be judicious to let go your hold and sit up straight, as if there wasn't anything at all the matter, in case her father comes in, or he may help you off the steps. These old men are very eccentric about such things.

And when you take the girl out to get ice cream, be sure to manifest a magnificent indifference as to whether she takes two plates or one. It conveys an impression of wealth, and makes your six hundred dollar salary swell to a million, apparently.

In popping the question, you will have to use considerable judgment. I wouldn't advise you to go flopping about over the floor on your knees. If you are at all acquainted with the price of pants you will perceive that it don't pay, especially if the girl says she won't go in.

Stand up to the rack like a man and take your fodder. Bury one of her little hands in your fin, squeeze it slightly, sigh like an old blacksmith's bellows with a slit in it, wait until she gets her head down, and then go in and make any little observations about the moon, your heart, blighted being, ecstatic bliss, and such trifles as may strike you.

If she says yes, you can tighten her dress to any extent, and run the risk of kissing her with rapturous appetite. If he says she won't indulge, the sooner you get your hat and get out on the pavement and stamp the bricks and skin your knuckles on the tree boxes, why the better you will feel.

A RARE GEM OF ART.
"The Lord's Prayer,"
A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the
LAST SUPPER,
Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniature groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of
OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.
Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.
QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street,
San Francisco.
Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secrecy, and all Sexual Disorders.
TO THE AFFLICTED.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secrecy.
TO FEMALES.
When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, they should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about their troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.
TO CORRESPONDENTS.
Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.
If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.
Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.,
San Francisco, Cal.
SPERMATORRHŒA.
DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs
This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of Six Cents in Postage stamps for return postage. Address,

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL

ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner porperty worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.

BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say: "It is, therefore, now the settled law that the municipal lands held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."

Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can procced to get their property.

POEM.

Written by Frank Bret Harte, on the occasion of the laying of the corner stone of the Californian Deaf, Dumb and Blind Asylum, September 27, 1867.

Fair the terrace that o'erlooks
Carving bay and sheltered nooks;
Groves that break the western blasts,
Steepled distance fringed with masts,
And the Gate that fronts our home
With its bars of cold sea foam.

Here no flashing signal falls
Over darkness sea and sail;
Here no ruddy light-house calls
White-winged Commerce with its hail;
But above the peaceful vale
Watchful, silent, calm and pale,
Science lifts her beacon walls.

Love, alone, the lamp whose beam
Shines above the troubled stream;
Here shall patience, wise and sweet,
Gather round her waiting feet
God's unfinished few, whom fate
And their failings consecrate;
Haply that her skill create
What His will left incomplete.

Ah, Bethsaida's pool no more
Sees the miracles of yore;
Faith no more to blinded eyes,
Brings the light that skill denies;
Not again shall part on earth
Lips that nature sealed from birth.
Though His face the Master hides,
Love eternal still abides
Underneath the arching sky,
And his hand through Science guides
Speechless lip and sightless eye.

This is our Bethsaida's pool,
This our thaumaturgic school;
We, O Lord, more dumb than these—
Knowing but of bended knees
And the sign of clasped hands—
Here upon our western sands,
By these broad Pacific seas,
Though these stones are eloquent,
And our feeble, faltering speech,
Gains what once the pebbles lent
On the legendary beach
Unto old Demosthenes.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

A Local Religious Poet.

We have always regretted the ruthless walling up of the Poets' Corner in the Alta, which used to so beautifully lighten up the heavy commercial matter on the fourth page. We lament the fact that the Call now seldom publishes original poetry by "Betty Briar," Herbert C. Dorr, and other local poets and poetesses. We now have an idea for the Alta, which, we trust, it will deem worthy of adoption. What the Alta most needs at present is a slight religious flavor to tone down the flippancy of Fitz Smythe, and correct the free-thinking editorials of the editor lately arrived from Paris. Let the Alta engage a religious poet. Le Courrier de San Francisco has one. In Thursday's issue of the Courrier, five verses of original poetry appeared over the signature of "Henri Million." They were sweet, soothing and religious. They were addressed "A Marie." We discovered after reading the first two verses that the Virgin Mary was addressed. In the first verse, Henri Million, in the most naive manner, confesses that this is the first occasion on which his muse has "promenaded herself, elevating her voice." He then remarks that while working down below he salutes the sweet name of Marie, and requests her to direct his steps. The third verse we skip; the fourth we will translate as literally as possible:

"Upon the ocean of the world,
Fair Mother of God,
To quiet its storm
Spread out thy mantle blue."

If the blue mantle of the Virgin is spread out on the ocean, Henri Million promises that he will light his candle on arriving at the port on the altar of the Virgin, who saves from death. Now, if the Alta would only publish a few original sacred odes, or—failing to procure them—republish some of Dr. Watts' hymns, it would gratify many readers no doubt. It is not creditable that the leading American daily of San Francisco should be outdone in religion by a French paper.

There's no Place Like Home.

We have always considered the Home of the Inebriate a most valuable institution, but until its merits were fully set forth in the Alta of Tuesday, never fully appreciated them. The reporter of the Alta says:

"Many a poor wretch now in San Quentin, if he had, in other days, a Home such as this to go to, where he would be kindly treated and supplied with clean clothes when convalescent, once more to go forward, seek employment, return again for food and lodging if employment could not be procured, and thus continue for a few days, would now be an ornament to society."

There's no place like home, and there's no home like the Home of the Inebriate. Why don't all the "poor wretches" make themselves ornaments to society by going to the Home of the Inebriate? Why doesn't every poor wretch get blazing drunk, get sent to the Home of the Inebriate, be kindly treated, supplied with clean clothes, and when convalescent seek employment? If he fails in getting work, he can once more get blazing drunk and return for food and lodging. Here's a chance for "poor wretches." The Alta holds out still more inducements to "fine fellows" to become inmates of the Home of the Inebriate. It says:

"Many a fine fellow, with brilliant intellect, now bereft of reason, might hold the highest position in the State if he had had the care and comfort the Home of the Inebriate now affords."

Here's a chance for a fine fellow. If he will only avail himself of the care and comfort the Home of the Inebriate now affords, he may occupy the highest position in the State—that is, he elected Governor? Who knows whether Gorham might not have been elected if he had only had a home like the Home of the Inebriate! There's no place like home. The oftener you go there, the more you appreciate its comforts. We hope that the Legislature will make a liberal appropriation to aid this admirable institution, which has done an incalculable amount of good; but there are always too many boarders to render it necessary for the reporter of the Alta to act as "runner" for the establishment and advertise its merits as a comfortable home.

A Japanese Star.

Understanding a little of the Japanese language, we think it our duty to inform the public of the purport of the first speech which the great acrobat, gymnast and balancer, Ha-yah-takee, addressed to them. A few prefatory remarks must be made. Until Monday evening last, Ha-yah-takee had never performed before Europeans. The American portion of the management explained to him as well as possible the manners, customs and ideas of Californians, and warned him not to make his performance "too Japanese." Ha-yah-takee replied indignantly that "his performance had been witnessed on several occasions by eighteen thousand princes and government officers, and had never failed to call forth the most enthusiastic applause, and he rather thought that he knew what he was about." On Monday evening, Ha-yah-takee appeared on the stage of the Metropolitan Theatre. He looked round with an air expressing, "Don't kneel, my friends; don't go into convulsions of delight; keep cool." The audience were rather cool. Ha-yah-takee then approached the foot-lights, and having made a bow, drew himself up to his full height, and exclaimed in the Japanese language, and with the tone and manner of J. H. Allen, when, in the Duke's Motto, he cries "I am here," "I am Ha-yah-takee!" Still the audience kept their seats, still they kept cool. Ha-yah-takee looked puzzled. Then he performed some very clever top spinning feats, still the applause was not as loud as he expected; then Ha-yah-takee made a low bow, and said:

"Princes, officers and ladies—hogs of barbarians! you miserable, unappreciative, uneducated grandsons of monkeys, I am Ha-yah-takee. I have the honor to present to you, most noble ones, my performance, you unfortunate, idiotic wretches! Happy was the day that I arrived among a people so polished, so enlightened, so—oh, you blind, miserable owls, you deaf dogs, you diseased green lizards!"

Here Ha-yah-takee nearly choked with rage. He had intended to be polite, but his ill-temper got the better of him, and when he occasionally recollected that none of the audience understood what he was saying, he would give vent to his true sentiments. Ha-yah-takee had cause for complaint. In his own country he is, in addition to being the best balancer, acrobat and juggler in Japan, an eminent humorist, and he howled with rage when his most funny jokes were received in dead silence by a California audience. We wonder if Heller wouldn't feel a little mad if he played before a native audience in Japan, and they wouldn't laugh at his jokes. We fancy he'd bow politely and give them a speech something like that which, as far as we could guess, (our knowledge of Japanese is not very large, we having only taken three lessons,) was delivered by the great Japanese star.

The Virtue of Breed.

There has been much discussion as to whether it is possible, by persistently cutting off cat's tails, to breed a race of tail-less cats; whether or no all the varieties of the rabbit can be produced in course of time from the progeny of one pair by judicious in-breeding, etc., etc. It is generally acknowledged that Noah took only one pair of pigeons into the Ark, and that if the one that was let out had not returned we might never have known the luxury of squabs or pigeon pie. One of the most favorite strains of pigeons is the "tumbler." Tumblers as a general rule produce pure tumbler pigeons. These pigeons begin to tumble and go through a variety of aerial acrobatic performances as soon as they are able to fly. Ha-Yah-Kee's children, like the tumbler pigeons, are born acrobats. They revel in gymnastic and acrobatic performances. The last is at present only a month old but it has already been found attempting to balance its bottle on its innocent nose. Young Sein-Se-Ketchie five years old, who performs the tub feat so perfectly, is a perfect enthusiast. We went into the theatre yesterday and fraternized with young master Sein-Se-Ketchie jumped him up and down, threw him in the air and went through other performances with him. He was delighted, and in choice Japanese said "I wish you'd keep that up for an hour or so." We continued for some little time, he laughing all the time in pure English—there was Japanese accent about his laugh, it was Ah, ah, ah! Eh, eh, eh! throughout. It struck us as rather a curious circumstance, that a kid who had from his cradle been set muscular tasks, should enjoy being jumped and thrown about. There must be something in breed, and the sons of acrobats—Japanese acrobats at least—must take to acrobatic and gymnastic performances instinctively and thoroughly enjoy them. selves.

A Sensible Poetess.

"Kate" sent some poetry to the Sunday Mercury, and it was considered by the editor a little too rough even for the Sunday Mercury. He says in his answers to correspondents: "Our advice to Kate is hereafter to forswear Apollo and betake herself to a practical imitation of Cinderella." Was Kate to be thus snubbed with impunity! We trow not. She bethought herself, "If the Sunday Mercury will not publish my poetry for nothing, I know a paper which will publish it in its advertising columns for next to nothing." So she went to the Times, and in yesterday's issue of that sheet appeared the following:

EDITOR MERCURY, YOUTH OF EXTRA BRAINS.

You say in wooing the muse I've lost my pains;
And you advise me Apollo to forswear.
You mean, sir, to terrify me with fear;
You recommend in your estimation
Cinderella's practical occupation.
A man in your office should have more scruple
When playing with the feelings of the people.
You had not cause for such comments at all,
The great God has made this world for all;
You should seize the golden opportunity
To amuse the public community.
It's a lack of gallantry on your part
To aim your arrows at a woman's heart
I view such conduct with a scornful eye,
And public derision I alike defy.
So you're lord of the Temple of the Muse,
And all those attempts meet polish'd abuse;
I wish you luck, sir, at the Temple gate;
So now adieu. Yours, very truly, KATE.

Thus did Kate write herself down a female donkey at small expense. She defies public derision and is determined to publish her poetry in "two squares one time" if it takes her last red cent. We hope we are not aiming "arrows at a woman's heart" in making these remarks. If we are and wound the susceptible "Kate" we offer as a compensation the republication of her two squares of rhyme (It) as a compensation. We consider Kate a very sensible poetess. The advertising columns of newspapers are open to all who are able to pay for them. If all the young poets and poetesses of California would be willing to pay a moderate sum for the publication of their effusions in the advertising columns of daily newspapers, it would be good for business and assist the times.

The American Eagle in the Minstrel Business.

One of the characters in The Bells of Shandon—we forget which, says that "if the American Eagle ever gets her claws on the Irish harp, she will play a tune which will make Englishmen tremble." We don't think that the American Eagle is exactly cut for the business of a wandering minstrel. We should be sorry to see the American Eagle trying to play the Irish harp, (it has done so already to some extent and its efforts have been unappreciated); the eagle can yet hold its own without considering it necessary any more to swear that no American Eagle is healthy unless it takes its shamrock salad every day before breakfast.

THE MURDER OF DR. GRAVES.

PARK Lane—or that part of Park Lane in which the Three Crowns Tavern was situated—was not, a hundred years ago, the fashionable quarter which it now is. It was chiefly known for the mountainous cinder-heaps which the dustmen, who had settled there from unknown times, had accumulated in waste places by the roadside. It was a wild, ragged, desolate region, into which few persons except the inhabitants of mean houses in the lane, or the bricknmakers or dustmen who lived in wretched hovels in the fields, would like to venture after dark. But the Three Crowns was a good house. It was both a coffee house and a tavern, with a bowling-green, and was frequented much by military men, some of whom met there regularly at night. The mounted patrol, who accompanied visitors at night on their way from Marylebone Gardens, frequently stopped for refreshment there, and left one or two of the convoy to swell the company—fellows who like to finish their night's amusement with a bowl at the tavern. They had sometimes, perhaps, less reputable visitors—for the Three Crowns pryed no more into its customers' affairs than other taverns. The man in the laced coat and jaunty three-cornered hat, who drank and played with any one who would might be the terror of the western roads—mayhap, the very hero of that dismal paragraph in the Daily Postboy, which some neighbor would read to him aloud. When his bill was paid, and his foot in the stirrup, neither the Three Crowns nor its company troubled their heads any further about him.

One evening—it was in the winter time—there came into the Three Crowns two strangers of respectable appearance, who desired to stay there for the night. One was a man of about forty years of age, of a short, strong-built figure; he carried his right arm in a sling. The other was older, of much larger stature, and evidently a man of great muscular strength. They attracted little attention; though it was afterwards remembered that they remarked to Mr. Bond, the laudlord, that they had just arrived from Richmond, and having business in London, they intended to remain there for a day or two. The elder one wrote some letters, about which they appeared to consult together sitting at a little table apart. Their manner, as far as could be called to mind, was easy and cheerful; they partook of supper; and the younger one, remarking that it was yet only nine by the great clock that stood in the room, proposed to take a short walk, as he said he was in the habit of doing after supper. They accordingly went out, and it was subsequently observed in confirmation of the truth of that intention, that although they were both booted and spurred, they left their horses in the stables. How long they were absent became afterwards, for reason which will be mentioned, a question of dispute. Some thought the time must have been near an hour; but it was stated and confirmed by two persons that a short time after they came in, it was noticed by the same clock which had marked the time of their going out.

That night was committed one of the most singular and terrible murders ever remembered in London. Before showing how suspicion fell in some degree on these two men, it is necessary to relate the circumstances exactly as they occurred.

There resided at that time, in Warwick street, Charing Cross, a physician, whose name was Graves. He was a man in the prime of life, in good practice, and though reputed to be of a somewhat stern character, well known for a man of perfect honor and intogrity. Late on the evening of the arrival of the two strangers at the Three Crowns, a man with a whip in his hand, and carrying a horn lantern, presented himself at the physician's house, and requested a woman servant to convey to her master a note that he had brought with him. The contents of the note were not known, nor did the servant observe the handwriting. Mr. Graves on reading it, immediately rose from his book, and desired his servant to keep burning the fire in his study until he should return, ordered his grey-coat and hat, and went out with the messenger. It was a black and bitter cold night, a keen wind sweeping the streets and carrying in their faces a cloud of sharp dust from the frozen ground. A male servant of Dr. Graves, as he was coming home, met his master and the man in the street, and he had observed a hackney-coach standing at the corner of Warwick street, in Cockspur street. The doctor stopped him to give some trifling directions, and passed on; and a moment after the man heard the hackney-coach drive away, from which he concluded that his master had hired it to visit some patient.

The household of Dr. Graves sat up for him that night; but he did not return, and no tidings came of him for several hours. Sometime after he had left home, there drove up to the door of the watch-house in Bishopsgate street a hackney-coach, the driver of which, who appeared to be in great terror, informed the watch that he had found in his vehicle the body of a gentleman, apparently dead. He stated that he had been hired about nine o'clock that evening in the Haymarket by a gentleman who ordered him to drive to the corner of Warwick street. He then bade him leave his coach there, and take a letter to one Dr. Graves in that street, who would, he said, come back with him. When he returned with the doctor, the same man was standing in the doorway of the coach. He made some observations to the doctor, who entered, and desired the driver to go to Barnard's Inn, in Holborn. On the way, the man who had hired him looked out of the window, and requested him loudly and angrily to hasten, and continued in that position for sometime, urging him to speed on the account of the importance of their business.

At Barnard"s Inn, his two passengers alighted; and the one who had hired him giving him three shillings for his fare to that place, and thence to Camomile street in the city, bade him proceed to a certain number in the latter street, where he was told that a gentleman would be ready to come away with him as before. They then went in at the gate of Barnard's Inn, and the driver left them; but when he came to Camomile street, he could not find the house to which he had been directed, and therefore took his place at a spot in that neighborhood, where chairs and coaches stood for hire. But some time afterwards, happening to look into his vehicle for a new candle for his lantern, which he kept in a box beneath his seat, he found a man still sitting in the corner, and apparently reclining against the back of the coach. Much astonished to find any one there so long after his two passengers had gone, he called to him but received no answer; whereupon he shook him and called to him; but finding him still silent, and feeling that his arm was heavy, he raised his lantern, the light of which was flickering out, and recognized the features of the Doctor to whom he had conveyed the note. His eyes was fixed and staring, his tongue protruding, and his countenance livid, like that of one who had suffered strangulation. A subsequent examination showed the lips were swelled, and one of the nostrils scratched, as if violence had been used to prevent his uttering any noise; his wrists were also marked as though they had been grasped tightly. The manner of the murder was immediately discovered. A thick cotton handkerchief was found wound round his neck, still tight and twisted, as if a stick had been inserted in a loop, and turned violently; and between the neck and the handkerchief was discovered a small block of a hard kind of wood, little bigger than a marble, which the murderer had inserted for the purpose of pressing harder upon the windpipe, and had apparently forgotten to remove. A purse of gold was found in one of his pockets; another pocket was found hanging out, and it was conjectured that a pocket-book had been stolen.

The coachman maintained the truth of his statements before a magistrate, insisting that only two persons had rode with him, and that he had distinctly seen two persons leave the vehicle at Barnard's Inn. Nothing was known at the physician's house of the nature of his errand, or of the contents of the note; nor could the note itself be found; from which it was imagined that he had cast it, after reading it, into the fire. There being no evidence against the coachman, and no reason to doubt the honesty of his statements, he was discharged; and although he was privately watched by the authorities, nothing suspicious was discovered in his conduct.

Considerable excitement was caused by the intelligence of the murder, and many theories started to explain the extraordinary statements of the coachman. What could have been the nature of the message which was brought to the Dr. and which induced him at a late hour on a wintry night to leave his study, and direct the man to drive to Barnard's Inn? Inquiries were made there; but it could not be discovered that any person in that quarter had known, or had any dealings with the murdered man. The Doctor, though said to be somewhat harsh in his manners, as men of his profession frequently are, was known to be at bottom a good-hearted man, and had few enemies. He was a tall man, and a man of great strength, whereas, by the coachman's description, the stranger who had hired him was a short man, and in all probability much inferior to him in that respect. How, then, could he have obtained such a mastery over him as to have been able to strangle him without attracting the attention of the driver? There was, it is true, the statement of the man, that two persons had left his vehicle; but few doubted that the darkness of the street, and his own natural presumption that as two persons were within, two must have alighted, had deceived him, and prevented his observing the real fact. As to the direction to drive to Camomile street, no one believed that this was any other than a trick to gain time, and to delay the discovery of the murder. But the mystery remained unsolved, and public curiosity looked eagerly for the announcement that some person had been fixed upon as the perpetrator of the crime.

We shall now see in what way the the two strangers who arrived on the night of the murder at the Three Crowns were found to be sufficiently connected with the murdered man to direct attention to the question of how they had employed themselves on that evening. Their names were Johnathan Springett and Samuel Bate. They retired to rest that night, after playing some games at cards, at the same time as the other guests; but the house being full, they had been placed in the room generally occupied by Mallet, the head waiter, in which two bedsteads had been placed for the occasion. They arose at the ordinary breakfast hour in the morning, and went out; and about noon they presented themselves at the door of the house of Dr. Graves in Warwick street, and desired to speak with him. On being informed that he was dead, they expressed much surprise, and said that they had not observed that the shutters were closed. They informed the servants that they had written to the Doctor only the night before, appointing to meet him at twelve o'clock that day on some business connected with the trusteeship. A letter, indeed, had arrived there that morning to the effect stated, which had been opened by the police. Its contents were simple enough; but where nothing is known, any fact is eagerly seized.

Some inquiries were made, and, that evening, both Springett and Bate were suddenly arrested at the Three Crowns. It was shown that Dr. Graves was the sole surviving trustee of a settlement made upon the wife of Springett on her first marriage; and that by the terms of the settlement, Bate would become trustee on his decease. It was also found that Bate and Springett were very intimate, and that the wife of Springett had been once or twice in London within the last month, to have an interview with Dr. Graves, as it was supposed, upon the subject of his trust. Mrs. Springett admitted that the object of her visits was to endeavor to induce the Doctor to allow her husband to employ a portion of the trust-money in establishing a business in London, and that the Doctor had resolutely refused to do what he declared would be contrary to his duty. The two men maintained that their journey to London had no other object than to endeavor to induce the deceased to comply with their request, by offering a legal indemnity from Bate against any loss that he might suffer in consequence. As to their absence from the tavern on the night of the murder, they said that they had walked as far as a hosier's shop at the corner of Old Bond street, Piccadilly, where they had posted a letter for Richmond, and another for Dr. Graves, which was the letter received on the following morning; and it was admitted that their absence had been too short to allow the possibility of their having been engaged in the murder. The coachman recognized neither of them. Springett, he said was most like the man who hired him; but he had not carried his arm in a sling, as Springett did. Springett explained the fact of the sling by saying that he had injured his arm by a fall some time previously. His voice, moreover, was unlike that of Springett, being hoarse and deep, like one who was suffering from a cold. It was argued, also, by the prisoners, that it would have been impossible for them to induce Dr. Graves to accompany either of them in the way described, as he did not know anything of Bato, save by name; and that, disapproving of the second marriage of Mrs. Springett, he had always endeavored to avoid her husband, and had never communicated with him, save by letter. These facts afforded so strong a presumption of the innocence of the prisoners, that, although it was suspected that they had reason to be glad of the Doctor's death, they were discharged; after having been frequently remanded and kept in prison during nearly two months.

Full a year after these events, when the subject of the murder had ceased to be talked about at the Three Crowns there arrived at that house, one night, a tall, elderly man, attired like a clergyman, and wearing an old-fashioned, full-bottomed wig, who brought with him some trunks, and stated that he had just come by coach from the West of England, having business connected with a lawsuit in London. He desired to be accommodated with a sleeping room, saying that he should probably remain there some time. Mallet, the waiter, showed him a room which was vacant; but he made some objection to it, and inquired if they had no other. The waiter then showed him another room which he also found fault with on account of its being near the top of the house—he being, as he said, naturally afraid of fire; but being informed that they had no other bedroom unoccupied, he at length consented to sleep in the room which he had first seen.

His objections to the sleeping-rooms were regarded as the whims of a naturally prim and fastidious man; but there was a strangeness in his manner which attracted the attention of Mallett. He wore at all times a pair of spectacles with broad black rims, and had several patches upon his face: and his clothes were large and ill-fitting. He absented himself during the day-time, and when there at night, he invariably set apart from the rest of the company, and appeared to be deeply engaged in perusal of an ancient volume, which he carried with him. He seldom spoke, and his voice was singularly harsh and disagreeable; but Mallet was several times struck with the idea that he had heard a voice somewhat like it before. He watched him, and one evening, when he supposed that he had retired to rest, he met him up-stairs in a passage that had no connection with his own room. He was so near the door of the chamber in which Mallet himself slept, that he could not divest himself of a suspicion that he had intended to enter there, but he found the door fastened. He excused himself by saying that he was about to descend, and had missed his way; but Mallet, though unwilling to communicate his suspicions to any one, resolved from that time to watch him more closely.

Mallet's bedroom had a long window opening on to the leaded roof of a building which formed part of the tavern. It was the very room in which the two men slept who had been suspected of the murder of Dr. Graves. One night, being unable to sleep, and having his eye fixed upon the window, he suddenly perceived the figure of some person who appeared to be intently examining the room through the glass The bed was in a dark recess at the other side of the apartment; so that he knew that no one at that distance could see whether he was awake or sleeping. Mallet, therefore, stretched out his hand, and taking a loaded pistol which he had placed by the bedside since the night when he had met their singular guest in the passage, he continued to watch the figure in silence. He was a courageous man, and was determined to ascertain what the object of his visiter was, before giving any alarm.

A moment after, he perceived that the window, which reached to the ground, and was divided lengthways, slowly opened, and he heard the footfall of a man cautiously stepping into the room. The intruder closed the window gently behind him, and then stopped a moment to listen. Mallet breathed loudly, to convey the impression that he was asleep: and expecting that he intended to do him some injury, or perhaps to endeavor to possess himself of the contents of a box in which some persons might know that the waiter kept money, he determined to spring upon him the moment he approached the bed. But, after remaining motionless for some moments, he perceived to his surprise that the man went directly to the fire-place, and groping about there, seemed to have discovered that it was closed up by a wind-board. He forced the board in, apparently by pressing it at the edges; and thus having made a slight noise, he paused to listen again. Finding that the inmate of the chamber was still breathing deeply, he appeared to grope for a while inside the lower part of the chimney; after which, he walked noiselessly again toward the window.

At this moment Mallet sprang from the bed, seized the stranger, and demanded his business there. The man made no answer, but struck him several violent blows in the face, hoping to overcome him and make his escape. Mallet, however, grappled with him, and determined not to quit his hold. He was himself of strong make; but the intruder was a man of extraordinary muscular power. He pressed his antagonist heavily against the wall, and seizing his neckcloth with one hand, endeavored to throttle him. Mallet had been unwilling to fire his pistol, but in the struggle it was accidently discharged, the bullet passing through the pane of glass without injury to either; and the noise of this quickly brought assistance. Long before this time, Mallet had discovered in him the pretended clergyman in the full-bottomed wig, but on lights being brought, he being then without his disguises, he recognized him immediately as the man Bate, who had slept there a twelvemonth before, and had been suspected, with his companion, of the murder of Dr. Graves.

His object in entering the room at night was soon surmised. In his possession were found a pocket-book and a silver gilt snuffbox, both of which were subsequently found to have belonged to Dr. Graves. They were begrimmed with smoke and soot, and had evidently been just removed by him from a ledge in the chimney, where he had, no doubt, secreted them a twelvemonth before. But a stronger evidence of guilt was discovered against him in the fact that, in one compartment of the pocket-book was found the very letter which had induced the Doctor to leave his house on the night of the murder. It purported to come from an acquaintance of a woman whom the Doctor once befriended, and who was stated to be then lying dangerously ill at a house in Barnard's Inn, whither it was requested that he should come immediately in a coach which would be waiting for him. Though signed in a fictitious name, and in a disguised hand, it was clearly recognised for the writing of Bate, and it was conjectured that, having removed the pocket-book and box from the body of the murdered man while his companion was busier urging the coachman to drive quickly, and having determined to keep them himself, and conceal the fact from his partner in the crime, he had hidden them in the chimney before he had found an opportunity to examine them; and, being suddenly apprehended, had been prevented from taking them away. The length of time which he had suffered to escape was explained by the natural supposition that, although anxious to remove evidences of his guilt, he had not dared to appear again at the Three Crowns until the events we have related might be supposed to be almost forgotten.

Springett was immediately after apprehended, and hoping, perhaps, for some favor, by throwing the guilt more completely on his associate, he confessed his participation in the crime. It was he who had hired the coach; and Bate, being a tall man, very much of the Doctor's figure, it had been resolved that he should get into the coach while the driver was gone with the letter; so that, although the Doctor would find two men there, a circumstance which they explained to him by saying that they also had been sent for by the sick woman, being relatives of her's, the driver would be ignorant of the fact, and would naturally suppose, when they alighted in the dark, that Dr. Graves and Springett had both left the vehicle. Springett admitted that his arm was not so weak as he pretended, and that he had removed the sling before hiring the coach, and had endeavored to disguise his voice, but he denied that he had actually assisted in the struggle. Bate, he said, had suddenly attacked the Doctor, when he (Springett) was urging the driver to hasten; but he could not deny that they both expected to derive the benefit from the Doctor's death, and that they hereby obtained full control over the trust money which they had since employed in keeping a gambling-house in Leicester Fields. As to the time of their absence from the tavern, Springett acknowledged that before calling the attention of several persons to the time of their return, he had taken an opportunity of putting back the hands of the clock in the room.

Bate, on the other hand, finding that the denial was useless, and being enraged at the conduct of Springett, declared that it was he who had obtained the particulars of the Doctor's friendship for the woman, and had conceived the idea of pretending that she had come to live in Barnard's Inn and had fallen sick there, which story he felt assured would be sufficient to entrap Dr. Graves into their snare. As to the murder, itself, he declared that Springett had grasped the Doctor's wrists, and otherwise assisted him, and that he had only looked out of the window, and endeavored to distract the attention of the driver, when their victim was already too weak to make further resistance. Springett gained nothing by his accusation of Bate. He was soon afterwards executed at Tyburn; but Bate was found one morning, sometime previously, self-strangled by a piece of cord, which he found means of obtaining.

LABLACHE.

His traveling about was always a serious matter. No ordinary vehicle was safe to hold him. His enormous weight rendered it necessary for his servant to take about a chair and bedding for his special use. It was difficult to find a carriage the doors of which were large enough for him to pass. On one occasion, the rehearsal at her Majesty's Theatre terminating sooner than was expected, and before his brougham had come to fetch him, a street cab was ordered. The cabman looked alarmed when his fare issued from the stage-door and showed the test which the vehicle had to undergo. "He'll never get in, sir," said the man, despairingly to me, as I was shaking hands with Lablache, who seemed also to have his doubts upon the question. We approached the vehicle; the door was open wide. Sideways, frontways, headways, backways, the prize basso tried to effect an entrance, but in vain. Without assistance it was impossible. Two men went to the opposite side and dragged with all their force, while two others did their utmost to lift him in. "It's no go," cried the cabman; "he'll ruin my cab." One more effort. A long pull, a strong pull—a push and pull together—the point was gained—Lablache inside, puffing and blowing from the exertion. But the difficulties had not yet come to an end. Wishing to change his position—he had inadvertently sat down with his back to the horse—he rose, and the whole of his prodigious weight was upon the few slender boards forming the bottom of the cab. Imagine the horror of the cabman, the astonishment of Lablache, and the surprise of a large crowd which had been attracted by the terrible struggle that had been going on, when the boards gave way, and his feet and legs were standing in the street. The driver swore—Lablache grinned—the crowd roared. No scene in a pantomime was ever more ridiculous. Fortunately, Lablache sustained no injury. Had the horse moved, the consequence of the accident might have been serious. The same process of shoving and pulling, but reversed, was necessary to extricate him. Whether greater violence than at first was used or not, the door in this instance was torn from its hinges, and the cab, previously a good-looking vehicle, now presented a most melancholy appearance of a complete wreck. The cabman uttered curses loud and deep, but was pacified by the assurance that the damage should be made good, and his loss of time remunerated. I do not think the great basso ever again attempted to ride in a cab.—"The Enterprising Empresario," in Once a Week.

Facts Worth Remembering.—The total number of human beings on the earth is computed at three thousand millions, and they speak three thousand and sixty four known tongues. The average duration of life is thirty-three and one-third years. One-fourth die before they are seven years old, and one-half before the age of seventeen. Out of one hundred persons, only six reach the age of sixty years. Out of five hundred persons only one attains the age of eighty. Sixty persons die every minute. Tall men live longer than short ones, and married men longer than single ones. Rich men live on the average, forty-two years, but the poor only thirty years. There is one drunkard to every seventy-four persons.

A SUMMER-DAY RHYME.

BY JAMES A. WHITNEY.

Again the glare on the dusty street
Of the sultry sun is shining down,
And I know that away in the valley sweet,
On the hill-top gray and the pasture brown,
On the oaten field, with its billowy crest
Yellow and sloping toward the west,
And the beechen wood where the branches meet,
The warm beams fall with a kindling glow,
While the air is hushed and the birds sing low
In the cool, deep glen where the rushes grow.

Nor stop nor pause on the rattling street
In the sound of carriage, and coach, and car,
Or the ceaseless tread of hurrying feet
Dull mingling with the roar and jar;
And I know in the fields where the grass is grown,
Where the clover blooms are in sweetness strown,
The iron harvester echoes afar
The cold clear tones of its blade so keen,
That stealthily glides through the herbage green,
While it falls down with the flowers between.

On either side of the stone paved street,
Proud and grandly the buildings rise,
Tower and turret and steeple greet
The eye that glances toward the skies;
And I think of the hills whence the wanderer sees
O'er the lapse of fields and the maze of trees,
The stream that calm in the valley lies
Where the corn is high and the cattle graze,
And on whose borders a smoky haze
Foretells the coming of autumn days.

Surging and flowing along the street,
The crowd moves on with its countless hearts,
Hearts that sorrow and hearts that beat
With hopes that triumph till love departs;
And I dream of the lanes where no footstep falls,
Of the lone, weird woods where the blue-jay calls,
And forth from the thicket the partridge starts,
Where low thro' the branches the south wind grieves,
And sifting soft through the tremulous leaves,
Sunshine with shadow fantistic weaves.

THE PANTHEON AT ROME.

The Pantheon, built, as its name implies, for a temple to all the gods, and now used as a church, is, perhaps, the best preserved monument of Rome's glory. It was erected by Agrippa, B. C. 27, and notwithstanding the ravages of time and wear, still stands, an object of admiration to every beholder. The interior is a rotunda, one hundred and forty-two feet in diameter, exclusive of the walls, which are twenty feet thick, and the height from the pavement to the opening in the top is the same as the diameter, half the distance being occupied by the beautifully arched dome. This opening in the top, twenty-eight feet in diameter, is the only window, and is formed by a bronze ring which supports the arch of the dome. Out of the many thousands of pounds of bronze originally used upon the buildings, this ring and door alone remain, and some doubts have been raised as to the antiquity of the latter. The outside, once covered with the finest white marble, now shows the brickwork in which there are many blind arches. The portico, "the most sublime result that was ever produced by so little architecture," is one hundred and ten feet long and forty-four feet deep, and composed of sixteen Corinthian columns, eight in front and eight in four lines behind them. The columns are of Egyptian granite, each one a single block, forty-six and a half feet high and five feet in diameter, with capitals and bases of white marble. The Pantheon is also interesting as being the burial place of Raphael, which fact is indicated by an inscription on a marble slab let into the wall. He died on his thirty-seventh birthday. The investigations of antiquaries had caused so much doubt to be thrown upon the statement of Raphael's burial there that, in 1833, the coffin was opened to settle it, and a cast was taken from his skull and hand. The Phrenologists connected with the Academy of St. Luke had long admired a skull which they supposed to be that of Raphael, but this investigation caused them to put it aside.

Scratch the green rind of a sapling, or wantonly twist it in the soil, and a scarred or crooked oak will tell of the act for years to come. How forcibly does this figure show the necessity of giving right tendencies to the minds and hearts of the young!

Conversation.—The great secret in conversation is, to admire little, and hear much; always to distrust our own reason, and sometimes that of our friends; never to pretend wit, but to make that of others appear as much as we can; to hearken to what is said, and to answer to the purpose.

The myriads of great inventions in the world are the results of all varieties of talent. If all men had been equal to Bacon or Newton, and yet all alike, the condition of our race would never have been half equal to what it is.

Of all ignorance, that which is silent is the least productive, for praters may suggest an idea, if they cannot start one.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE RELIGIOUS ASPECT OF DARWINISM.

A RECENT number of the New York Round Table contains an article presenting some fresh and interesting thoughts on the religious objections that have been made to the Development Theory :

"To many worthy persons," says the writer, "the Darwinian hypothesis seems the last word in the teachings of materialism and atheism. This is not an unnatural impression. The human mind delights in bringing the unseen close to the seen, and in attributing an event whose law is not yet explained, to some mysterious and supernatural cause. The daily phenomena of nature, and even the production of the individual organism—however high in the scale—are willingly referred to natural causes. But when the origination of whole 'kingdoms of life' is considered, or the formation of great classes of individuals with similar characteristics, even distinguished naturalists cannot avoid abandoning the scientific method and calling in the miraculous act of creation.

"A theory which endeavors to explain the marvelous variety of the material creation, the existence of countless species and genera in all the branches of living organisms, the color of the flower, the shape of the insect's wing, the form of the bird, the organs and adaptations of the shell, the fish, the plant and the highest animal, by the operation of the simple laws of inheritance and natural selection working on a few primeval forms of life, certainly at first sight appears to remove the Creator far from us. All those exquisite adaptations —the mathematical form of the bee's cell, the instincts of ants and beavers and various animals, the wonderful structure of the eye, the bill of the woodpecker and the rudimentary eyes of the mole, the bucket of the orchid, the ingenious and complicated machinery for fructification in the vegetable world, the organ and form of each great family of living existences so wonderfully suited to its element and its wants—all these, which to the short human sight seem precisely analogous to the effects produced by the human reason and invention, have to be given up as proving a direct reasoning contrivance from the immediate hand of the Divine Contriver. The old doctrine of final causes, as employed by Paley— an assistance to so many weak in faith, and a stumbling-block to so many— must be abandoned, at least in its ancient form. These adaptations are seen to come from the slow working of a few principles, acting through countless ages, with innumerable failures, and what might be called imperfections, but at length issuing in those admirable, though not yet perfect, contrivances.

"Can we wonder that such an hypothesis, if proved true, should seem to the unreflecting mind, or even to many thoughtintellects, to remove the Creator from the universe and substitute the dry action of law?

"But why should this be its effect to the religious mind? As science advances and nature is more and more penetrated, we must all be willing to admit that our previous conception of the Deity and his modes of action, taking our analogies in our own mental states, is necessarily imperfect. The Divine Being may be a contriver, an architect, but not contrive or build as man does. Because he does not mould a bee's cell or put together the machinery of an eye as man would, does not exclude him from his works. It should be remembered that science, under its most material direction, has not been able to seperate the Deity from the universe. Even if the as yet unproved hypothesis of the convertibility of forces should be able to demonstrate that all material forces are one, there is yet that one force to be accounted for. If here selection be proved the law as a groundwork of the organic universe, and the various kingdoms of life be traced back to but one source or three or four different sources, we must then explain the origin and the intelligent direction of that one force which lay back of the first germ of life, and which still moves the universe.

"The tendency of science is indirectly to acknowledge continually an unknown, mysterious, intelligently-acting power or principle. And though it promises not to seek for the primary cause or even to investigate any theory of the nature of that cause, but simply to note facts carefully and faithfully, and then to generalize them, yet indirectly it may afford to the religious thinker and investigator many solid grounds to confirm his intuitions.

"Natural selection simply throws back the power which moves the machinery of the universe. It does not deny it or seek to weaken our belief in it. On the contrary, it strengthens our faith in its intelligent action, and adds to our conception of its grandeur by extending the slow processes, even in framing the simplest forms of life, over atoms of atoms."

Darwin himself says in the conclusion of his last edition of The Origin of Species, that "there is grandeur" in the view of life as presented by his theory, a view, representing life "with its several powers as having been originally breathed by the Creator into a few forms, or into one; and that while this planet has gone cycling on, according to the fixed laws of gravity from so simple a beginning, endless forms, most beautiful and most wonderful, have been, and are being evolved.

On the more perplexing and perilous question of the gradual formation and transmission of human instincts, mental and moral faculties—in a word, of what we call mind and soul—the writer in the Round Table says :

"If anywhere in the long course of the development of organic life it demands a creative act, it is where mind begins. Nor are even the transmutations united on this great question. Wallace, the co-discoverer of the great law of natural selection, admits that a new era began in the physical history of the world when soul was infused, when the half human creatures of the pliocene or some earlier age 'had to mind to vary' as do the animals. Darwin must admit a creative act in the origin of the different kingdoms of life; he may also admit it when soul originates. But to a reasoning faith we do not see that it can make much difference whether the Creator now at some unknown point of growth of the human germ, inbreathes by miraculous act the soul—'the power of our endless life'—or whether the first appearance of this new and transforming element in the world was the result, ages ago, of forces He had set in motion, and which continue still to act by transmission and selection under His supporting power."

The longer and more patiently the mind dwells upon this stupendous idea, the less repulsive does it become, and the less identified, by any necessity, with either materialism or atheism. The thought that all the phenomena of nature and all the innumerable forms of life are the result, not of single arbitrary acts of creation, but of the long inter-play of forces-working according to law of forces put into operation count, less ages ago, does not all dispense with the necessity of a Divine Contriver, nor is there anything in it that is calculated to belittle our conception of the Creator.

BURNING WORLDS.

We observe that the following paragraph, from the North British Review, is making the round of the newspapers :

"What this change is to be, we dare not even conjecture; but we see in the heavens themselves some traces of destructive elements, and some indications of their power. The fragments of broken planets, the descent of the meteoric stones upon our globe, the wheeling comets, welding their loose materials in our own satelite, the appearance of new stars, and the disappearance of others, are the solar furnace, all foreshadow of that impeuding convulsion to which the system of the world is doomed. Thus placed on a planet which is to be burned up, and under heavens which are to pass away; thus treading, as it were, on the cemeteries, and dwelling upon the mausoleums of former worlds, let us learn the lesson of humility and wisdom, if we have not already been taught in the school of revelation."

An eastern paper, speaking of the probable destruction of our planetary system by fire, thus alludes to the astounding phenomenon which not long ago attracted the attention, and stimulated the speculation of astronomers on both sides of the Atlantic :

"In May last, a little twinkler in the constellation Corona Borealis, or 'Northern Crown,' suddenly blazed a star of the second magnitude, and on analyzing its rays with the spectroscope, the light was pronounced to be identical with that emitted by certain gasses in a state of combustion. The universal opinion of scientific men who observed the spectacle, was that the star was on fire—an opinion which was strengthened, as time wore on, by the gradual dying out of its newly acquired lustre. By the 22d of June the star had dwindled from the second to the nineteenth magnitude. It has since become still more insignificant, and when burnt out—assuming the theory regarding it to be correct—it will, of course, be invisible.

"Although we have spoken of the burning as in progress, the probability is that the casualty occurred in a former and more remote age. The distance of the star from the earth is so enormous that the light of the conflagration may have been many centuries—perhaps thousands of years on its journey hither! It must be borne in mind too that the fixed stars are supposed to be solor systems like our own; not single worlds, but congeries of worlds, with suns for their centers. The theory of the astronomers is that a planetary system has been consumed! Imagine our own sun—now the genial source of life and warmth suddenly wrapped in flames by the liberation and ignition of its eternal gas! What would be the effect! Every planet and satelite, from red Mercury to the pale orb that runs it course on the uttermost confines of the sphere of solar attraction would be destroyed in a twinkling of an eye. The earth would be calcined, and of all its millions, not a vestige would remain. We may well shudder at the idea of a system of worlds having been obliterated in a moment and without warning, and yet, to the systems remaining, the one extinguished was but as a grain of sand to the myriads on the sea shore. A due consideration of this latter fact may possibly calm the fears of those who look for a grand catastrophe in this part of the universe at an early day. If the incomputable millions of systems suspended in space are to be destroyed one by one—and this would seem to be a natural inference from the late phenomena, if it has been rightly interpreted by the astronomers—our term may be much further off than the Millerites anticipate."

MATTHEW ARNOLD'S NEW VOLUME.

The late occupant of the Chair of Poetry at Oxford, has recently published a new volume of poems. "It is only at intervals," says the Imperial Review, "that Mr. Matthew Arnold reminds us with what skill and grace he can give expression to subtle thought and feeling in verse. As a poet, he has never attained to a wide popularity, and probably never will. And to this it is to be presumed that he is serenely indifferent. We do not imagine that he would be inclined to estimate very highly the value of the popular favor that is extended, with perfect impartiality, both to Tupper and to Tennyson. He does not attempt to conciliate popular tastes, and has never deferred to popular prejudices and prepossessions. He has not yielded to the impulse of literary fashion in poetry, and has been almost insensible to the influence that one or two of his contemporaries have exercised on the poetry of the present day. His writings possess a strong individuality of their own; they accurately reflect the sympathies of one who, above all, reverences intellectual beauty and greatness." There are not many poems of the kind in our language that can equal the following in quiet beauty :

"Far on its rocky knoll descried
Saint Michael's chapel cuts the sky.
I climed; beneath me, bright and wide,
Lay the lone coast of Brittany.

"Bright in the sunset, weird and still,
It lay beside the Atlantic wave,
As if the wizard Merlin's will
Yet charmed it from his forest grave.

"Behind me on their grassy sweep,
Bierded with lichen, scrawled and gray,
The giant stones of Carnac sleep,
In the mild eveuing of the May.

"No priestly, stern procession now
Streams through their rows of pillars old;
No victims bleed, no Druids bow;
Sheep make the furze-grown aisle their fold.

"From bush to bush the cookoo flies,
The orchis red gleams everywhere;
Gold broom with furze in blossom vies,
The bluebells perfume all the air.

"And o'er the glistening, lonely land,
Rise up, all round, the christian spires.
The church of Carnac, by the strand,
Catches the westering sun's last fires.

"And there across the watery way,
See, low above the tide at flood,
The sickle-sweep of Quiberon bay
Whose beach once ran with loyal blood!

"And beyond that, the Atlantic wide!
All round, no soul, no boat, no hail!
But, on the horizon's verge descried,
Hangs, touches with light, one snowy sail!

"Ah, where is he, who should have come
Where that far sail is passing now,
Past the Loire's mouth, and by the foam
Of Finistere's unquiet brow:

"Home, round into the English wave?
He tarries where the Rock of Spain
Mediterranean waters lave;
He enters not the Atlantic main.

"O, could he once have reached this air
Freshened by plunging tides, by showers!
Have felt this breath he loved, of fair
Cool northern fields, and grass, and flowers.

"He longed for it,—pressed on!—In vain.
At the Straits failed that spirit brave.
The South was parent of his pain,
The South is mistress of his grave."

"In poetry of this kind," says the Imperial Review, "much of the effect depends on the existence of a certain intellectual sympathy between writer and reader." If this is absent the language remains nearly barren of significance. And it is owing to the action of this intellectual law that Mr. Arnold's poems remain uninteresting to many. Only those who have something in common can properly appreciate one another. Mr. Arnold has lately assumed, in some degree, the position of a prophet vigorously denouncing all that he holds evil, and as enthusiastically clamoring for what he holds to be necessary for the welfare of the country. And wicked scoffers have ventured to sneer at the "elegant Jeremiah" in response to his exertions. Does he, in the following pithy and spirited verses, give his own estimate of his position, and his resolution as to his future course of action?—

"Creep into thy narrow bed,
Creep, and let no more be said!
Vain the onset! all stands fast;
Thou thyself must break at last.

"Let the long contention cease!
Geese are swans, and swans are geese,
Let them have it how they will!
Thou art tired; best be still!

"They out-talked thee, hissed thee, tore thee
Better men fared thus before thee;
Fired their ringing shot and passed,
Hotly charged,—and broke at last.

"Charge once more, then, and be dumb!
Let the victors, when they come,
When the forts of folly fall,
Find thy body by the wall."

WILKINS' VIEW OF PARTIES.

BY JOHN QUILL.

"NOW, Johnny, dear, I think you might, just this once."

"It's perfectly useless for you to 'Johnny, dear' me, Mrs. Wilkins, I pledge you my word and honor, as a gentleman that I will give no party in my house this winter. You can bet your life on that, so that finishes it, and you might as well go to sleep. I'd rather hear you snore than talk any time."

"But, my dea——"

"Now don't aggravate me, Mrs Wilkins; don't make me mad. Let me have a little peace and quiet for gracious sake. I want to see how it sounds when you're not talking. I ain't agoing to have any party, and that settles it."

"Well, then, I think it's real mean; there's O'Ferguson's had one, and we must return it or be disgrac——"

"Must? Who says we must? I tell you distinctly we mustn't, Mrs. Wilkins, and there ain't any O'Ferguson this side of the grave that will make me change my mind. O'Ferguson! Well, I should think so. O'Ferguson be hanged. Do you suppose because that corpulent old calf chose to make a deliberate and systematic fool of himself I've got to do the same thing? I guess not. I don't run with that machine. And if I wanted to give a party, I wouldn't do it just because O'Ferguson did. That's so now."

"Mr. Wilkins, you shan't talk so about that family; Selina's my own cousin."

"I know she is, and that's the very identical reason I don't like her. She's no credit to anybody. I won't have her in my house again, I tell you. Do you suppose I'm going to have her come here as she did last winter to that party, and stand along side of me like a prize ox, and make me appear insignificant in my own parlor, and then try to break down the stairs by falling against the banister. I ain't agoing to do it."

"O what a story, Wilk——"

"Yes, and pretending it was the ice cream that didn't agree with her, and then going into the parlor and undertaking to sing, and giving all my friends up stairs the impression that we were grinding coffee in the front parlor, and waking up Jones' baby next door so that it bellowed all night, and started all the cats in the neighborhood to yowling like mad. Why it was ridiculous, Mrs. Wilkins, perfectly ridiculous."

"You're talking like a fool, Wilk——"

"And there was young Noodle, he actually insulted me at my own table. Actually had the cheek to call me an 'old boy,' and ask me to 'pass the rosy.' What kind of manners has a man got, I'd like to know, who proposes my health at my own table, as, 'here's good look to old Wilk, may he live long and prosper,' and when I went up stairs wasn't he and Grubb laying on the bed with their boots on, and talking about my being 'an old turtle,' who 'threw a nasty fin'—while Jenks was painting moustaches on my portrait with a piece of burnt cork?"

"I don't want to hear about it."

"Don't want to hear about it? But I tell you you've got to hear about it. Do you suppose I'm going to be shut up in my own house. You don't want to hear how I went into the library and caught you with your face close to that infernal Fitzsmythe's, and then how you started up with a lie on your lips, and said you were trying to blow something out of Fitzsmythe's eye. Do you suppose I believe that? I'll black his eye for him, I will by George, when I meet him again. No man shall kiss my wife, degraded as she is, before my face. If he shall—blame me."

"There's not a word of truth in——"

"And when I got mad about it, for you to turn round and pretend to faint, and to fall into his arms, and look more like a second-hand jointed doll, than a decent woman, while he kept squeezing your hand under the pretense that he was trying to restore the circulation. I say I won't have it. If you're going to bring a lot of half-grown snobs to my house to rob me of my wife's affection right out in the face of company, no more parties do you get out of me, so you might just as well stop your clatter and go to sleep."

"But, Mr. Wilkins, I just want to say a word——"

"That's the way with you; you always want to say just one word, and then you go on and talk the dictionary stupid. I don't want to hear it. You get no party out of me. I ain't going to have Holofernes Montgomery disgracing himself by dancing around over the floor with about as much grace as a crippled tumbley bug, and kicking the company on the shins. And there was Bencephalus Alexander pinning Miss Gritz's dress around the piano leg, so that when she went to strike out in the next figure, she ripped out a thousand yards of millinery and gathers, while he hastily went up stairs and came down into the parlor dressed in the baby's yellow flannel night gown with a hoop-skirt on, to represent a canary bird in a cage."

"It was only his little fun——"

"Hang his little fun, I won't put up with it. I tell you I would be guilty of heartless cruelty to my own offspring if I permitted them to behave so. And there's Mary Jane. You've educated her to play the piano, and no sooner do we get a stranger in the house than she goes and glues up her spit curls, and comes down and does her very level best to split the keys of that piano, and bust the strings into atoms. She's being ruined with company. No innocent and happy child twelve years old, would ever plan to run away with that little jackass Bob Flips, and get Breckenridge Augustus to make a rope ladder out of the clothes line so that she could elope out of the dining-room window at eight o'clock in the evening, and fly up the alley in a velocipede. It's outrageous. I won't have the pure unsullied minds of my children tainted so. It's bad enough to have a perfectly heartless and worldly mother like you——"

"Mr. Wilkins I'll pull your hair if——"

"—Like you, who absolutely don't care a cuss if they grow up and go to the poor-house and penitentiary, so that she can invite a lot of cattle here to stomp out my carpets, and eat my victuals and smoke my cigars, and make me feel wretched in my own house. But go on—go on—I'm of no account. I can't check you in your headlong career, I know. But you shan't ruin me, if I know it. I'm virtuous, and by George I'll be happy if my own wife does go to the deuce."

"Don't talk about virtue, Mr. Wilkins; where were you last night?"

"What?"

"Where were you last night?"

"What do you want to know for?"

"What was the matter with you that you came to bed with a standing collar on, and a cigar stump in your mouth?"

"I didn't."

"Yes, you did, and your breath smelt of cloves and lemon peel. You talk about decency. But I know all about that club, and it nearly breaks my heart."

"What club?"

"O, you needn't pretend you don't know about it, 'The Sacred Brothers.'"

"Who in the deuce——"

"Now don't get mad, Wilkins. You know you've sworn an awful oath never to go home until you've drank nine drinks. It's disgraceful. Positively disgraceful."

"Who told you about it?"

"O never mind, it was a friend of mine."

"Has that Fitzsmythe been——"

"O, never mind."

"Mrs. Wilkins, if you don't tell me I'll murder you."

"Well, it was—but no I won't tell."

"Tell me, I say, or I'll go to to the window and holler murder. I will, by George."

"Well then it was your friend—I'm afraid you'll be mad."

"Look here, do you want to create trouble in this family? Who was that man, I ask you?"

"Well it was O'Ferguson."

"O Ferg!—what!—you don't mean to say that he!—Did he tell you that. Well, if I don't lather him, the dirty blackguard,"

"What are you doing, Mr. Wilkins?"

"Why, I'm putting on my clothes to go down there now. I'd flog that man in the deadest hour of night."

And Wilkins slammed the door and went out. But I have reason to think that he didn't flog O'Ferguson, for a man with about the configuration of Wilkins was seen next morning, at three o'clock, trying to sing, "I won't go him till morning," and making a wretched failure of it.—Philiadelphia Sunday Transcript.

THE MONOTONY OF LIFE.—The general character of life is that of monotony. Whether we regard the life of man, or the life of beasts, we are struck by the same remarkable fact, that life, to all outward appearance, is a monotonous succession of scenes and movements—all but identical. We wonder how the interest is kept up. But we never tire of going to bed at night; and we are very sorry when we tire of getting up in the morning. We never weary, except with regret, of breakfasting, dining, and supping; and yet these actions are repeated incessantly three hundred and sixty-five times in the year, with renewed excitement on every succeeding occasion. We take off our clothes once every day, and we put them on once every day. We do this, at nearly the same hour, in daily succession; and when health is good, the pleasure derived from so doing is not marked by the repetition of the act; for the ebbing and flowing of our bodily sensations prepare us, without any efforts on our part, for all the vicissitudes of our existence. When hungry, food is agreeable: when weary, sleep or rest is a treat; when warm, the cool air is agreeable; when cold, the pleasure derived from a cheerful fireside and a comfortable supper is delicious. The excitement is kept up by contrasts; and we purchase the enjoyment of one feeling by encouraging the reverse. With health, and youth, and prosperity, we should never be weary. It is age, and weakness, and poverty that prepare us for death; and even that comes easy upon most men, at last, like a sleep, and the heaviness of the heart gives even the last sleep a welcome.

BLACK AND GOLDEN HAIR.

The disposition to secure to one's self a head of black hair has often been the fashion, and people have devised all sorts of means to have their hair of the proper shade. It so happens that it is much easier to dye the hair a jet black than any other color, and this circumstance is favorable to the frequent revival of black as the fashionable hue. There is, however, in some cases an apparent difficulty, for nature has almost invariably established a sort of harmony between our proper complexions, our hair, and our eyes. We cannot possibly alter our eyes, but we can change our complexions and our hair; in fact, we do so, for now that belles who take the lead in such matters come out with "coal black hair," like the milkmaid's in the song, a mysterious shade is also imparted to the skin. A gypsy complexion and glorious raven tresses, such as Sir Walter Scott commemorates, cannot fail to be very impressive and effective; but the bronze and the black lose their power if matched with a pair of eyes such as nature gives with Indian locks and complexions. Under these circumstances it is certainly advisable that those who cannot resist the temptations of the color in vogue should approach it with caution, and pause the moment art begins to destroy the charms of nature; for charms are destroyed so long as they are eclipsed. When golden hair was all the rage, we fancied we were making ourselves like the ancients; for they tell us, according to Mr. Truefitt, that the old poets ascribed red hair to warriors, and tresses of gold to syrens—that Apollo had golden locks, Mars had red hair, Venus yellow tresses, and Minerva flaxen braids. The revival of this old style may probably be traced to theological tendencies, for the advocates of pre-Raphaelitism are mostly High Church, and mostly patronize fair hair. I know they say Queen Elizabeth had hair as yellow as a guinea, and this is perhaps why Shakspeare patronized that color, though it hardly accounts for Milton's preference for black. Blacks are of course diversified, and some of them are decidedly dangerous, and may bring years of penalty in return for a fleeting enjoyment like that of being a la mode.

THE surgeons' reports show that our armies have suffered greatly from chills and fever which is induced by the miasma and change of climate to which they are exposed. They also find Ayer's Ague Cure is an effectual remedy for this distemper, and are urging the Government to adopt it within the regulations. The Surgeon-General hesitates, because it is put up in a proprietary form. However great that convenience to the public, he prefers the physicians of the army should give their own directions for the doses. Whatever professional pride may dictate, he knows as well as we do, that Dr. Ayer's "Cure" is an almost perfect antidote for the Ague, and that the soldiers should have the benefit of it, as well as the people.—Washington (D. C.) Correspondent.

Two Hundred Thousand Dollars worth of new Fall Dry Goods to be sold at great bargains. Meagher, Taaffe & Co., having made immense purchases of new Fall Dry Goods at the recent great auction sales of H. M. Newhall & Co., and Voison, Ris & Co., are now selling them at surprisingly low prices at their retail store, No. 9 Montgomery street. The goods consist of French, English and American dry goods, black and colored silks, wool and silk dress goods, shawls, laces, embroideries, and every style of housekeeping goods. For a more particular specification of these goods, see Meagher, Taaffe & Co's. advertisement elsewhere in this paper.

PREMIUMS FOR HAIR WORK.—Mrs. C. Cook received two premiums at the late Fair held at Sacramento—one for the superior workmanship of hair jewelry, the other for devices and landscapes in hair. This lady received the premiums at the last Fair given in San Francisco, and will probably continue to receive them at every Fair where her beautiful handiwork will be exhibited. Call and examine her display of all kinds of hair work, at No. 519 Montgomery street, between Clay and Commercial, over Barrett & Sherwood's.

THE ITALIAN RESTAURANT.—This favorite restaurant, No. 515 Merchant street, opposite the Washington Market, has for years past sustained an enviable reputation for the good fare it served for the moderate price of fifty cents per meal. "The Italian" has recently been purchased by Mr. Guiseppe Cabenaso and the public may rely that nothing will remain undone by its new proprietor to sustain its good name and popularity.

CALIFORNIA POWDER WORKS.—These works are located at Santa Cruz, and have supplied the whole Pacific Coast with a superior article of blasting, sporting and cannon powder since their erection, and such has been the demand on their resources from time to time, that additional machinery and buildings were found necessary to supply the increasing demand. The California Powder Works were the first to reduce the price for Blasting Powder to $3 per keg. The importation of Eastern manufactured blasting powder has almost entirely fallen off in consequence. We have now not only a superior article of powder, but a cheaper one as the result. Mr. John F. Lohse is the Secretary, office No. 318 California street.

CURING THE SICK WITHOUT MEDICINE is an easy affair to one who knows how. Dr. Bourne knows how, and attends to his professional duties personally. Dr. Bourne is not a horse jocky. He can be found at his office, 10 Masonic Temple, from ten o'clock morning until five evening, Sundays excepted. Guarantees cures for a stipulated fee, and is sure to cure. *

"DR. BOURNE'S BATHS," 10 Masonic Temple, are open until seven o'clock, evening, for the express accommodation of those who quit business at six o'clock; who, however, must take a bath before supper New arrangement—one dollar and upward, for gentlemen only. *

AMARANTH.

BY H. SAVILE CLARKE.

O LOVE! the dearest theme of all,
The oldest of the world's old stories,
No fairer fate can e'er befall
A poet than to sing thy glories.
And, as Anacreon confest,
In verses full of power and passion,
His lyre would always praise love best,
The world has followed in the fashion.

Old Horace, in the classic days,
Sang sweetest of Love's fatal arrow;
Catullus wrote an ode in praise
Of Lesbia, and her pretty sparrow;
Beranger sang of his Lisette;
And Burns to Mary brimmed the chalice;
There's Beatrice—Dante's pet:
The Laureate's Adeline, and Alice.

And still to love the lyre is strung,
Still Eros rules our modern measures;
There's not a maiden's name unsung,
No phase of Love's eternal pleasures.
Love beckons in the painter's dream,
Makes music in the poet's metre,
O'er youth and age he rules supreme:
Can any other sway be sweeter?

And still the songs of all the world
Shall celebrate Love's endless blisses
While on a neck a tress is curled,
And while a red lip pouts for kisses.
In verse, by any poet planned,
The praise of Love the sweetest line is,
Until Fate takes the pen in hand,
And on the page of life writes "Finis."

MEMOIRS OF THE STAGE.

REMOVING stage and theatres, and the actors and actresses, and the talk about the stage, and the readble books of memoirs, what a blank would be left!

Inseusibly the theatre influences us more than we imagine. Our novelists and romancists have a hankering to write their chapters in dramatic form, and your true forcible writer, when he comes to an exciting piece of business, will, if he have any skill, conjure up a stage before him, light up scenery and footlights, and see the whole in busy action. Our women dress themselves as for the stage, and for stage effect. Stage talk and stage gossip, proposals for new plays, green-room rumors, critiques, who does not love these things? They have a dim and indescribable charm. Above all stage memoirs, the anything but brief chronicles of the time, making almost fascinating reading. For her garrulity, a vulgar vanity and candor, blend with a dramatic abundance of detail, that give a unique value. Some are good, some bad, some utterly worthless, because written with a genteel affectation and unfaithfulness. But they are curious nevertheless.

Old Cibber's Apology has been put at the head of the list. It is in truth a book apart from the rest, and of almost a philosophical quality. But, to get well behind the scenes and see all the littleness of that day, we should take up Mrs. or Miss George Anne Bellamy. A more curious, rambling book: purposeless, dateless, yet full of color and detail. Execrable English, the language of a housemaid turned into a fine lady by fine clothes and plenty of money.

The works of actor writers would fill many a shelf. We have Chetwoode, perhaps the oldest Victor, Hitchcock, Edwin, Reynolds, Michael Kelly, Lee Lewes, and many more; but from them stand out two of remarkable merit, admirable, graphic, honest, accurate, and most entertaining—Tate Wilkinson and O'Keefe.

Tate is really a remarkable book, and for perfect genuineness, and for power of expressing the turns and workings of the human mind, may be set beside Boswell. Even his unconscious perversons of the truth are transparent, and make the book more honest. It is a series of pictures, and we see Foote and Garrick, lords and ladies, London and Dublin. That this unique book should not have been better known is surprising; but it has grown very scarce.

This was the day of strolling companies. England was divided into theatrical circuits, which the country managers "went" regularly, like the gentlemen of the law. Engaged by one of these, Wilkinson, freed from Mr. Garrick's tyranny, found his way to Portsmouth. His picture of the place is full of drumming and drilling, with the fleet lying out in the roads, and "the gallant Rodney" on shore. It was all drawbridges and lines, and military gates and posts; where the visitor was stopped and questioned. Officers of the navy and army filled the streets. The little theatre of the place was sure to have support from such a constituency.

But the company was a strange and motley one. A Mr. White was jeune premier, who lisped and pronounced Garrick "Gaa-ick;" Moody, newly come from Jamaica; a stout Mrs. Osborne; a Miss Kitty White, whose mamma was the amusement of the profession for her rambling talk and strange blunders. There were crowded houses. The officers were glad to know the droll Wilkinson, and even "the gallant Rodney" was specially courteous to him. One night, when he was playing "Hamlet," and Moody as "Gravedigger," was shoveling away, up to his middle, the manager plucked him by the sleeve, and whispered, hurriedly, "Take care; for Mr. Garrick is in the pit!" We may conceive the sensation behind the scenes; every one thinking that the eye of "the London manager" was on him or her. It was near the end of the play; so Wilkinson could not well make out the great actor in the pit, and went home to supper and bed, thinking the whole was a mistake. But next morning came a message from the Fountain Tavern with Mr. Garrick's compliments to Mr. Wilkinson; would he come and breakfast with him? Surprised and overjoyed, the actor hurried away, and was greeted heartily at the Fountain Tavern by his old manager. Nothing could have been more charming or even engaging than Garrick's behavior. He was out, he told the other, on a little holiday, staying with Dr. Garney, at Wickham, some eight miles off—an old friend to whom this visit had been promised for years. Dr. Garney was a retired physician, who had made his fortune, and was greatly respected in that part of the country.

Mrs. Garrick was there also; and Mr. Garrick said he had been charged by her and the Doctor to make Mr. Wilkinson fix his own day, and come out to them. "A visit," added Mr. Garrick, kindly, "which we shall all return." After breakfast, they went out to walk and see the town, the great Mr. Garrick leaning on Mr. Wilkinson's arm—"an honor I dreamed not of." They went on to the ramparts, saw the dock-yards, and all the time Mr. Garrick was asking about his young friend's prospects, and how he was doing, and congratulated him on being such a favorite. Indeed, it needs not Mr. Wilkinson to tell us that, "whenever Mr. Garrick chose to throw off dignity and acting, and was not surrounded by business to perplex him, he had it in his power to render himself a most pleasing, improving, and delightful companion." He was in such good spirits that he had a bottle of hock made into a cool tankard for luck.

On the appointed day, Wilkinson drove out in a post-chaise to Dr. Garney, dressed in gold lace, like a gentleman. He was received by Garrick, as he says, "like his son." The Doctor and his wife were "good" people, and made him welcome. So did Mrs. Garrick. "She was, in truth, a most elegant woman; grace was in her step." Garrick showed him the place, which was charming, "a little paradise," with exquisite views, gardens, conservatories, and a lofty observatory built by the Doctor himself. He "ran and skipped like a lad of twenty." He delighted Wilkinson by complimenting him on his dress, merely objecting to the buckles, which were too large for the mode, and rather like a sailor's. The actor's heart was rejoiced at being treated "like a man of fashion" at dinner. Garrick spoke of the benefit night, and said to the Doctor and his lady that he would take it as an obligation to himself if they would give their patronage to his friend, Mr. Wilkinson. At ten o'clock, after a pleasant game on the bowling-green, Mr. Garrick saw him out to his chaise, gave him some parts to study, and said he hoped there would be no impropriety in bespeaking a play for Friday, July 27; "and we desire, Wilkinson, you will fix on a favorite character, and do your best for the credit of both; and damn it, Tate, Mrs. Garrick expects you will have a dish of tea ready after her jaunt, by way of relaxation," (this was an allusion to his Monologue:) "and if you disappoint us, Dr. and Mrs. Garney and all the party will be very angry. So take care!" And thus ended a very happy day for the young actor.

We may conceive the sensation Wilkinson's news produced in the company. But Wilkinson was not to have the lion's share, as he had hoped. There was a sort of emeute, each actor being eager to play his favorite and most conspicuous part, so as to catch the eye of the London manager.

Mr. White, the jeune premier, very dirty and unshaven about his face, and fond of morning gin, asked, with bitter contempt, "Who is Mr. Gaa-ick? Mr. Gaa-ick has no command over the Portsmouth company. I think Mr. Gaa-ick cannot be displeased with my 'Macbeath,' though I want no favor from Mr. Gaa-ick."

All combined against Wilkinson's monopoly, and the Beggar's Opera was fixed on as giving a fair chance to all. But Mr. Wilkinson was to have his Monologue and the Author, as his share.

All the genteel people of the neighborhood hearing of the "bespeak," and that Mr. and Mrs. Garrick were coming in, crowded to the little box-office; and when Friday night came round, there was really a full house. The Beggar's Opera began, but the great party had not come. The first act went by, the second began, and the actors and audience began to grow dissatisfied, thinking they had been led there under false pretence. In particular Mr. White was scornful and angry, some of his best bits of his Macbeath having been played. But towards the end of the act, the party from Wickham entered, and took their places with the eyes of the whole house on them. It was noticed that Mr. and Mrs. Garrick paid the closest attention, and applauded heartily. We may be sure that night was long remembered at the Portsmouth little theatre, and it seems a fresh picture, and its primitiveness and rustic character, coming after the London worldliness, must have been enjoyed by Garrick himself.

After the play, there was supper at the Rainbow Tavern at which various local persons of distinction came in and paid their compliments to Mr. and Mrs. Garrick. Before them all, Mrs. Garrick very delicately and kindly thanked Wilkinson for his performance. At some time past midnight she retired, having to sleep at the house of one of Dr. Garney's friends, these good people "not hearing" of her staying at a tavern. Mr. Garrick, who, says Wilkinson "never failed in his attention to his lady," would not suffer her to go with the servant, and wrapping himself in a handsome sea-captain's cloak which belonged to Mr. Wilkinson, attended her up the street. When he returned, he said he was quite pleased with his walk, as it had made him acquainted with Mr. Wilkinson's snug roquelaire, which he thought would be exactly the sort of thing for him during the winter months between Southamptou street and the theatre, and save him many a sedan-chair journey. He therefore commissioned Tate to get him one in Portsmouth, and bring it up to London.

It was a very pleasant night. They sat till past three. Great consideration and homage was paid to the illustrious guest, who never showed to such advantage. The whole of this scene does, indeed, exhibit the guest of the good honest Garneys unrestrained, not "stuck up."

Later the actor wishing to pay a complimentary visit to Dr. Garney, determined to ride out. His description of his adventure is delightfully naive and graphic:

"I had seldom," he says, "used myself to that mode of traveling; for though I had frequently gone from London to Hampton Court and Richmond, yet it was generally in a post-chaise." The ostler of the Fountain brought to the door a very fine-looking horse and asked him if he rode much. The other "assured him the contrary." "Because I beg then sir, as you are not a jockey, that I may take those spurs off." He then set off, and for the first mile or so, which was through streets and over drawbridges, "I found it a very delicate matter, either by giving the horse his own way or checking him, to keep him within the power of my art of horsemanship. By degrees, the horse seemed wisely to comprehend that his own self-will and sagacity were superior to his rider's. My ignorance was manifest to the animal, and he was fully convinced I assumed a government to which I was not by any means competent, he was determined on rebellion, and to himself usurped the reins of power." Having achieved two miles with safety, the horse suddenly set off with fury, throwing his rider into an abject state of alarm, which was increased by finding it a narrow road, and the London wagon lumbering on leisurely in front, "at which," says Mr. Wilkinson, "this dreadful beast rushed so that the wheel stopped and checked my right leg, and brought me to the ground, and on my fall the horse's hind hoof struck my jaw, and made it bleed most plentifully. Providentially the men stopped the wagon, but almost against their will; for they could not conceive, from the fury of the beast and the supposed misguided rage of the rider, but I was some foolish mad fellow eager to show my horsemanship, neck or nothing." The wagoners were half angry, half amused. "They only damned for a feul; for they were right zure I mun be mad to ride dumb beast to fright the wagon, like." But when Tate explained it was an accident, they laughed heartily, and said "I should never win the King's Plate at Newmarket." Wilkinson was helped on the horse's back, who had been grazing all this time, and resumed the reins. "I determined to be very steady, and not venture on the perilous canter any more: a gentle trot at the most was to suffice, and that with all precaution. We were joggiug on as if by mutual agreement, when an officer, going on to Hilsea Barracks, came flying by, calling out, 'Your friend Scott dines at Hilsea; do come to dinner, Wilkinson,' and went galloping on. My fiery-footed steed, scorning to be outdone in courtesy, obeyed the summons with the utmost swiftness, while, Gilpin-like, I held by the pommel of the saddle, expecting every instant my neck would be broke. I was at the last gasp with this devil of a horse; for the officer had no thought but I was determined to outride him, and be at Hilsea the first; but on seeing the turnpike, I cried aloud, 'Shut the gate! Murder! murder! For God's sake, shut the gate!' At first they did not comprehend me, but on observing my awkward manner of riding on this my flying horse, and my continued cry of 'Shut the gate,' they did so before I got to it; and then another fear arose, which was, that of the horse's despising the barred gate, and leaping over it. Fortunately the creature, either in pity to my fears or regard for his own limbs, or from the custom of stopping at the gate (which I cannot pronounce,) halted there, and that suddenly, on a supposition, maybe, that the king's duty was necessary to be loyally paid, to which he was possibly daily accustomed, and to my astonishment in the midst of horrors he pleasingly surprised me by so doing, for he seemed equal to any mad exploit whatever."

From the turnpike-man he got a glass of water, and set off again "on the irregular paths of Portstown;" and he naturally reckoned the animal had "settled to reason," but on the up hill, down dale, once more he began more swift than ever.

"For one to expatiate on the wonders I this day performed in the noble art of vaulting horsemanship might make Astley fearful of a rival, and dare me to a trial of skill." It ended by horse and rider tumbling down an uneven hill, and rolling over to the bottom, A more humorous description, in which there is quaintness, and naivetee, and perfect candor, cannot be conceived. It makes a very fair specimen of this curious actor's memoir.

O'Keefe's recollections appeared in the year 1826, yet they struck back a marvelous distance. He, too, only cares to tell what he saw, and writes without that pomp of words anda ffectation which is the blemish of the modern personal memoir. He gives a series of little glimpses of life a hundred years ago, which shows us the colors and dresses, as if painted pictures. He saw the days of the old Dublin Theatre, when old Lord Trimleston was driving about in a superb chariot painted over with "boys in the Flamingo style," the gift of Marshal Saxe. "Drapier's heads" were still the popular sign, swinging over his head as he walked, and an old Captain Debusay walked about the street "unremarked" in the dress of Charles the Second's day. In London he saw the mob attack the Moorish ambassador's house on suspicion of his having put to death one of his slaves, and beat him and his people all down the Haymarket. He saw Churchill walking about, "a large man of athletic make, dressed in black, with a large black scratch-wig." He was in a coffee-house in St. Martin's-lane one morning when the newsman came in and laid No. 45 of Wilke's North Briton on the table. Later standing at Charing-cross, he noted a tall slender figure in a scarlet coat, large bag, and fieree three cornered hat, carefully picking his way across the street through the mud. That was "Jack Wilkes." But his picture of Ireland in those days makes us sigh and look back wistfully. There were no gipsies, no poor-rates, and no pawnbrokers. The great pride of a countryman on a Sunday was to have three or four waistcoats. The milkmaid sang as she milked; and if the song stopped, the cow began to kick the pail. They all cut each other's turf, and dug each other's potatoes, lending the car or horse. The grand object was to have the halfpenny of a Saturday night, the piper's fee, who played for the jig. In Dublin, so eager were the authorities to encourage the linen manufacture, that the yearly carriage licenses were set apart to buy spinning-wheels; and once a year there were set out at the top of St. James street, and distributed gratis to every one who came. These were charming times, when "my lord's" or "the squire's" was known as the "big house" and had its fool and running footman; and O'Keefe often saw these latter skimming along the road in a white jacket, blue silk sash round the waist, black velvet cap and silver tassel, a frill round the neck, and a seven-foot staff, tipped with silver, through whose aid they leaped the diches. Will those days ever come again for ould Ireland?

Curious in their own way are the strange, rambling, vain and vulgar recollections of Miss George Anne Bellamy, daughter of Lord Tyrawly. The center of all is of course, the writer; but this becomes an end and aim to which everything is distorted. Histrionic vanity is a special department in the collection of human weeknesses; yet, with this disadvantage, her story is valuable and characteristic from its sheer outspoken vanity, which overcomes every inducement to affectation. We see Garrick in his Dublin town playing at Smock Alley Theater, and the recherché of all recherchés; we see "Peg" Woffington in the green-room, and Miss Ballamy and that famous actress "having it out" a battle royal behind the scenes about their dresses as the Rival Queens. We see how, on benefit nights, the stage was "built up" with an amphitheatre that reached to the flies, so that when the curtain rose there were nearly as many before the foot-lights as behind. Thus the actor, to "come on," had to force his way through a crowd at the wings; and the charming Cibber, dying as "Juliet," had a whole crowd of admirers seated on chairs quite close round the tomb. Did an actor drop his hat or glove, a friendly spectator was seen to go forward gravely and hand it to him. There was no end to the conventional absurdities of the stage in the last century. When the hero was near his end, two of the stage servants appeared with a small strip of carpet, which they solemnly laid in the center so that he might die in comfort. But in the case of an inferior actor, writhing and working in agonies, clawing and tearing at the grand, as was then fashionable, it was found that he had quite wrapped himself up in his strip of carpet. "Gold tickets"—happy days for actors!—were then in vogue, every man of fashion who patronized the stage sending his ten and twenty guineas on benefit night. We see Dr. Young, Mr. Foote (whom we see best of all in Mr. Forster's essay,) Sheridan the actor, Quin, "Counsellor Murphy," Doctor Johnson, and a host more. The King of Denmark came to see Jane Shore, and—not so very unnaturally—fell fast asleep. Then the lively Miss Bellamy, putting extry energy into her part, drew up close to his box, and called out, "O thou false lord!" which roused him, and amused the house. She passed through the strangest vicissitudes; now, being "abducted" at the stage door; now, going to Paris and living sumptuously; now, ending miserably in a debtors' prison.

HISTORIC DOUBT.

WE all have a lively knowledge of the accepted story of the Maid of Arc. We know how the lonely girl of thirteen followed her father's flocks, or sat beneath the venerable oak-tree, shunning the companionship of her schoolmates. Righteous indignation flashed from her eye as she walked over the ashes of the once lovely church of Domremy her happy village home, despoiled by the Burgundian marauders. We can follow her to Vouceouleurs, and thence to Chinon, where she at once selected the disguised Charles from the crowd of courtiers, and confidently announced her high mission. We can trace her to Orleans, where she led the van, and sent haughty summonses to the English with the signature, "Jhesus Maria et Jehanne la Pucelle;" at length driving back the enemy from the beleagured city, and thus kindling anew in her countrymen the light of patriotism, and beginning a new era in French history. Then we remember her reverses: how she was captured during the siege of Compiégne, and handed over by her captors to the English, who datained her at Rouen; how the zeal of the Bishop of Beauvais and the University of Paris procured her trial on the charge of being a "disciple and lymb of the fiend, that used false enchantments and sorcerie;" how her accusers allowed her neither counsel nor adviser of any kind; and, during a trial of fifteen days duration, examined her with great virulence; how they extorted her opinion of the revelations made to her by certain heavenly voices, and of the visions which she was permitted to behold, and her declaration that she would choose to obey those voices rather than the ordinances of the Church.

For this reason she was condemned by the University to be burnt at the stake. But her courage failed her, more perhaps at the thought that she was fighting single-handed against the venerable wisdom of the Church than at the peril of life which she had braved so lightly on the battle-field. She signed a recantation and her sentence was commuted to perpetual imprisonment.

Two days and nights of solitude brought back her old convictions, and dispersed her new doubts. Her only feeling was one of shame at having turned aside for a moment.

"What I resolved," she declared, "I resolved against truth. Let me suffer my sentence at once, rather than endure what I endure in prison." She was taken at her word.

On the thirtieth of May, fourteen hundred and thirty-one—exactly a year and a week after her capture, when she was not more than twenty-one years old, if as much—she was informed of her doom: To be burnt alive, that very day, in the market place of Rouen. For a few moments the awful shadow of death, so sudden and terrible, was too chill and black for her to bear. She wept bitterly and called aloud on the great Judge of Heaven to wreak instant vengeance on her enemies and to save her from their cruelty. But her courage soon returned. At nine in the morning she was placed in the hangman's car and escorted to the market-place by a party of English soldiers. A lying sermon was preached. She was bound to the pile; a mock mitre was placed upon her brow, inscribed with the words, "Héretique Relapse, Apostate, Idolátré," and the wood was lighted. Her ashes were thrown into the Seine. Meanwhile, the Charles whom she had crowned was forgetting all but himself in his regal revels, and stifling conscience for his desertion of the high-minded maid in the company of dames and light maidens with whom he was in stronger sympathy.

This is the account which the ordinary historical authorities give of the end of Joan of Arc; but a few old records exist at Metz and Orleans, which tend to prove that she was alive long after the period of her reported martyrdom; and, a short time ago, these were collected and made the most of by Monsieur Delepierre, in an interesting tract entitled Doute Historique (Historic Doubt.) When are we to take up again a fact in history, and say to ourselves, This is settled beyond all dispute?

He begins by quoting the authority of the Pere Vignier, an eminent antiquarian of the seventeenth century. This investigator, while examining the archives at Metz, in the year sixteen hundred and eighty-seven, found an entry to the effect that, on on the twentieth of May, fourteen hundred and thirty six, "La Pucelle Jehanne, who had been in France," came to that town; and, "on the same day came her two brothers, one of whom was a knight, and called himself Messire Pierre, and the other, Petit Jehan, an esquire," who thought that she had been dead; but, "as soon as they saw her they recognized her, as she did them." The document goes on to state that on the next day they took her to Boquelon, and procured for her a horse, a pair of leggins, a cap and a sword; and "the said Pucelle managed the horse very well, and said many things to Sieur Nicole, so that he felt sure that this was she who had been in France; and she was identified by many signs as La Pucelle Jehanne de France, who had consecrated Charles at Rheims." After going to Cologne and many other places, where she was looked upon as the genuine Maid, she reached Erlon, where "she was married to Monsieur de Hermoise, a knight;" and soon after this "the said Sieur de Hermoise and his wife La Pucelle came and lived in Metz, in the house which belonged to said Sieur."

The Pere Vignier did not set much value on this record (and we cannot blame his skepticism) until the next year, sixteen hundred and eighty-eight, when he happened to dine with a Monsieur des Armoises, who after the entertainment, gave him the keys of the family library, where to his surprise and delight, he stumbled on a marriage contract between "Robert des Armoises, knight, and Jeanne d'Arcy, called Maid of Orleans." This confirmation of the Metz record satisfied him.

Monsieur Delepierre then refers to some documents found at Orleans in seventeen hundred and forty, which contain charges under the years fourteen hundred and thirty-five and fourteen hundred and thirty-six, for money given to a messenger, who "brought letters from Jehanne La Pucelle," and to Jehan de Lils, (that being the title by which her brothers had been ennobled,) "to help him in returning to his sister." There is a third entry; "To Jehanne Darmoises, as a present, made to her on the first of August, fourteen hundred and thirty-nine, after the deliberation of the council of this city, for the services rendered by her at its siege: two hundred and ten livres."

As a last documentary evidence, there is a petition from her brother, previous to his being ennobled in fourteen hundred and forty-four—a date contradicicted by the Orleans charge, which was made in fourteen hundred and thirty-six. This petition represents that "he had left his native place to join the king's service in company with his sister, Jehanne La Pucelle, with whom, up to the time of her absence, and since then till the present he had risked his life."

Monsieur Delepierre also urges, that at the time of Joan's reputed execution, in the year fourteen hundred and thirty-one, there was a common talk that she was not dead, but that the English had put another victim in her place. Thus the Chronicle of Metz, after relating the story of her imprisonment, trial, and burning, concludes, "ainsi qu'on le raconte, car depuis le contraire a été prouvé." (As they relate, for the contrary has since been proved.)

He regards the period which elapsed between her condemnation and execution, and the extraordinary precautions which were taken to conceal her, as calling for some explanation. He notices that several women who assumed the name of the Maid of Orleans were tried and punished as imposters, while no proceedings were taken against this Jehanne des Armoises, or de Hermoise, or Darmoises. In conclusion, he considers that these various facts are only explicable on the supposition that some young woman was substituted for her at the burning pyre of Rouen and that she continued a captive until the death of the Duke of Bedford in fourteen hundred and thirty-five, when she was released from prison, and returned to pass many more years in the world.

Assuming the genuineness of the evidence thus adduced (but trustworthy critics have rejected it,) there is little to prove that this Jehanne was not one of the many impostors whom the circumstances of the time produced; but one more successful than the rest. The personations by Lambert Simnel, Perkin Warbeck, and others in our time, are instances of credulity and deceit working together successfully. The state of France was so unsettled, and the circumstances of this case were so peculiar, that this fraud was easy. Many would be ready to receive a clever impostor, without instituting any very curious investigation; and the brothers of Joan, if they were not themselves deceived, might be disposed to countenance a fraud which would increase their influence. Then the cowardly sacrifice of the Maid would be a sufficiently delicate subject with the king and courtiers for them to wish to hush it up. Besides the Amazonian Joan was as much needed at the time of her death as she was during her life. The enemy had been but feebly, incoherently repulsed. The forces she had set in motion were at work; but they needed her strong will to urge them on. Do we believe that having nearly burnt more than her fingers over State affairs, she gave them up, and ended her days as a comfortable housekeeper?

NEW VOLCANIC ISLANDS.—The Perseverancia, a Portuguese journal, announces that two islands near Lisbon have been subjected to continued volcanic eruptions. Strong shocks of earthquake have been felt, and many islets analogous to Santorini have been elevated. Early in June, a submarine volcano cast up igneous matter, so that a tongue of land conecting the continent and islands were formed.

HOMES IN CALIFORNIA.

MR. BOWLES, Mr. Greeley, and most of the other intelligent and observing gentlemen who have from time to time visited this coast, and have afterwards published their impressions concerning California and her people, generally agree in speaking indulgently, rather than admiringly of our present social condition. Few of them have failed, in one way or another, to note among its existing characteractics, the comparitive feebleness of that "home-feeling" and of those family ties which acquire depth and strength in older communities. An absence of sentiment among our women and young people, and a disposition among all classes to decide every question of worth, value, and desirableness by reference to a pecuniary, or a bold utilitarian standard, are also prominent topics of remark with these observers from abroad. As to the alleged comparative weakness of home feeling, and of the ties of kindred among us, we suspect that men who have passed the middle age of life are liable to see indications of this kind through the illusory page of their own feelings and experiences. Elderly persons are apt to think the world has changed, when the change is really in themselves. Instances are by no means infrequent of the same species of complaint in regard to society at the East, on the part of Californians returning after a long absence to their early homes. Hawthorne predicted the decadence of "homes" as a consequence of the general substitution of air-tight stoves for the old-fashioned fire-place, arguing that "homes" without "hearths" were an impossibillity. It seems at any rate to be quite certain that the family sentiment, and the feeling of kindred, are generally stronger in cold countries than in those of a milder temperature. A comparison of the poetry and fictitious literature of Germany and the north of Europe with that of southern nations, will illustrate this in the most striking manner. Family ties constitute a very large element in the legends and tales of the Germanic and Scandinavian races, while in those of the South, passion and gallantry predominate, almost to the exclusion of other elements. Most assuredly a rigorous climate that during a considerable portion of the year keeps the household together, and brings it in a family group around the fireside in the long nights of Winter, would seem a priori more favorable to the strengthening of domestic ties and the development of the sentiments of home, than one so mild and genial as to make it not only practicable but pleasant to pass the greater part of the time not devoted to sleep, in the open air. As to the alleged materialistic tendancy in Californian society, the disposition to refer the decision of questions of relative value to a pecuniary standard, to base social distinction upon wealth or occupation; these things undoubtedly exist; but are they confined to California? Are they not rather marked features of the society of nearly all great American cities? Most assurredly if the delineations of fashionable life at the East, which we find in the current literature of the day, are to be accepted as at all reliable, Shoddy aristocracy and Bummagem gentility are quite as predominant and influential in New York and the other principal Atlantic cities, as in San Francisco. So far as there is any foundation for the complaints in regard to the absence in California, of "homes" and of the associations that hallow the word, such complaints have equal force as applied to American homes generally. The change has come with our departure from simple and primitive modes of life, the introduction of more artificia habits, an increased taste for luxury, and a consequent relaxation in the fashionable code of social morality. It is a most significant and deplorable fact, that there are entire circles of our existing society in which children in the family are regarded as an incumbrance and an annoyance, rather than as a comfort and a delight. And this can only be explained by the fact that in such circles the majority of children are undisciplined and spoiled. Upon the whole, we are inclined to the opinion that, notwithstanding the supercedure of broad-mouthed fire-places and back logs, by grates and fenders there may still be homes no less happy than in the days of our grandfathers; that they are as horrible in California as in New York; and that the most formidable obstacle to their realization is the neglect of firm and wise family discipline on the part of parents, so that children become plagues and annoyances, instead of being the light and joy of the house.

The French papers report the death of Madame Victorien Sardou, wife of the celebrated dramatic author.

The August number of Blackwood contains an able article on "Intemperance and Intolerance." The opening paragraph furnishes the key-note of the article: "For thousands of years it has been the general belief of the most civilized nations of the world, that wine was one of the noblest gifts of Heaven to the human race—a gift like all others, to be temporarily enjoyed and gratefully acknowledged. * * * Of late years, and especially in Great Britain and America—wine being too expensive for the bulk of the people, and good beer being non-existent in America, and heavily taxed and greatly adulterated in Great Britain—a taste for alcobolic drinks has unfortunately arisen, and produced an excessive indulgence. * * * To remedy this evil a sect of fanatics has sprung up on both sides of the Atlantic, whose principle is, that because some men drank too much whisky, no man, if they can prevent it, shall be allowed to drink any whisky—and most tyrannical and unreasonable prohibition of all any wine or beer." It is calculated to startle our somewhat large lager-drinking population, to learn upon such high authority that "good beer is non-existent in America;" and we should imagine that it be no less startling to the English lover.

Gen. Henry A. Wise, in the course of an oration recently delivered by him on the occasion of a Church Festival in Virginia, said that the South must bring in all the white foreigners who can be persuaded to immigrate and make common cause against the freedmen. Poor freedmen! exclaimed Mr. Wise; I really have a great pity for them. They are most cruelly separated from the best of the white men—the true gentlemen who were always their real friends. They are at liberty now to side with bad counselors if they want to. They are exposed to demagogues; they are tempted by whisky; they need not work unless they choose; they may vote. Of course they won't vote for us, and we can't allow them to vote for anybody else. A war of races is inevitable.

The speaker further expressed his anxiety to be acquitted of any impious purpose of "upholding the designs of Diety;" whereupon the New York Tribune remarks: "He need be under no uneasiness on that score. Gen. Wise has always been understood to belong to the opposite side."

The Rocky Mountain Herald, is the title of a new journal to be published at Denver, Colorado, by O. J. Goldrick & Co., as editors and proprietors. We have received a printed circular stating that the Herald will start with a large circulation obtained in every city and settlement between Cheyenne and Santa Fe, thus making the paper a most advantageous medium for Plains and Mountain advertising. On the margin of the circular are penned half a dozen lines not designed for the public eye, asking an exchange with the Californian, in terms more complimentary than classical, and concluding with the assurance that the Herald will abound in "screeds of interesting news from the 'Eastern Slope' of the Sierra Madre—as sure as scalping!" Those who know anything of Mr. Goldrick's fresh talent as a journalist, will not doubt that the Herald will be a readable paper.

The July number of the London Quarterly contains a very interesting article entitled "New Paris," in which the salient features of La Nouvelle Babylone, as Eugène Pellehan has been pleased to call it, are presented in a vivid and striking manner. The titles of nine books of which Paris is the theme, eight of which have been published during the present year, are prefixed to the article and constitute its text. One of the books mentioned is Louis Verrittol's Les Odeurs de Paris, which has gone through five editions. The title reminds one of Coleridge's "Expectoration" against Cologne, in which city he declares

> "I counted two-and-seventy stenches,
> All well defined, and several stinks."

Concluding with the classic apostrophe:

> "Ye nymphs that reign o'er sewers and sinks,
> The river Rhine it is well known
> Doth wash your city of Cologne;
> But tell me nymphs! what power divine
> Shall henceforth wash the river Rhine?"

A number of partizan journals are using it as an argument against Mr. Swett, candidate for Superintendent of Public Instruction, that he has compiled a "school reader" which contains selections from patriotic speeches by such men as Gen. Baker, and by other "abolitionists." Anything more paltry and ignoble than the spirit that inspired an objection like this, it would be difficult to conceive. The spectacle of Californian journals objecting to specimens of E. D. Baker's splendid eloquence in a school reader, because the old hero was a Republican, furnishes a sad illustration of the meanness, and pettiness of soul that are sometimes engendered by bitter partizanship.

From the general tone of the Republican papers at the East, it would seem that they are learning to regard the impeachment of the President as a direct necessity. Quite a number of leading journals that have heretofore treated the proposition with marked coldness, and several that have directly opposed it, now speak of it favorably. The New York Tribune is one of the latter class.

A UNIQUE VALEDICTORY.

Mr. Prentice Mulford, in entering upon his new duties as editor of the Stockton Gazette, bids adieu to San Francisco and to old associates and associations in the following quaint and characteristic strain:

"Before welcoming a new set of rounds on the treadmill of life, it is decent and appropriate to bid farewell to those we leave. We leave thee, San Francisco, in time, perhaps, to escape being swallowed up by an earthquake. (We now advocate the interests of Stockton, and shall unintermittingly continue to pull earthquakes on the Bay city.)

"Farewell, then, Montgomery street, with your hurrying, rushing, pushing crowd, your street corner idlers, your gay, gorgeous and, for the most part, badly dressed women, your pig and dwarf shows, with their concomitant din of drum, fife and hurdy-gurdy.

"Farewell, Kearny street, with your broad and narrrow side, walks, reminding us of the two roads taken, respectively, by saints and sinners. Farewell you street cars of capacity unmeasurable and Chesterfieldian conductors. Farewell to Telegraph Hill, with its goats, its shanties and its children, who never tumble off those precipices and make an item for the local man. Farewell to Long Bridge, its moonlight promenades, its whispering lovers, embowered in the shade of lofty lumber piles and its rowdy boys.

"Farewell to the Opera House and the Metropolitan, with its enevitable array of heartless critics—emaciated Williams, of the Bulletin; massive and gloomy Kendall, of the Call; quiet and stealthy Densmore, of the Era; profound Parsons, of the Times; God knows whom of the Alta; carping Johns, of the Californian; lymphatic Ford, no more, of the Mercury, and all the rest not to the above mentioned belonging, who gain their entre on the strength of unadulterated brass or a few wildly written paragraphs, produced spasmodically at intervals.

"Farewell to the immodest San Francisco wind, which such unwarrantable liberties takes with the attire of our wives and daughters. Farewell to the dust, eye-searching and crevice penetrating. Farewell to the suburban sands and sand-hills disappearing so fast before the strong arm of the steam or Corkonian paddy.

"Farewell to Meigg's wharf with its collection of sagacious, philosophical and entertaining monkeys, its boorish bears, its chattering parrots and macaws, its whistling jays.

"Farewell to his omnipresent majesty, Emperor Norton, with his new hussar cap presented by Louis Napoleon, his knobby stick and knobby and hirsute proboscis.

"Farewell to Bowman of the Chronicle, ever bound up Montgomery street at six A. M. bending under the weight of new books, pamphlets, magazines and exchanges. He is taking them to his den there to devour them. 'Tis there he skins the Banner of Progress and chops from the Monterey Gazette. A lion to roar, a wasp to sting. N. B. He has recently moulted, shed his coat, laid aside his old chyrysalis, and is now a big bug of great promise and more performance among the butterflies of fashion. Farewell to the Examiner sanctum, graced (if you say disgraced we'll metaphorically and metaphysically knock you down) by the namesakes of the first and last Presidents, Washington with a B. Johnson (not Thompson) with a P——and a G. Farewell——there are some to whom we will not say farewell. 'Tis a gloomy world and there are thoughts, memories and recollections which know no such word. Behind us are left a few great souls to whom remembrances are realities. There is no adieu, we trust to the place we have held in their hearts, though temporarily we are bereft of their tangible presence."

Mr. Harte's poem on the laying of the foundation stone of the Asylum of the deaf mutes and the blind, is very much above the average of productions of the kind, written for "occasions." The first three stanzas, in particular, could scarcely be better. The last, we suspect, was composed in haste, and at the latest moment. Otherwise, we doubt much whether the allusion, "Unto old Demosthenes," with his mouth full of pebbles, in connection with the stones of the asylum, through which we "are eloquent," would have passed the ordeal of Mr. Harte's critical judgment.

The New York Tribune gives currency to a statement that the President has a regular corps of private detectives, paid out of the secret service fund, who are employed to watch all persons who favor his impeachment. It adds: "If he keeps on in his present course, his spies will have to watch more than two millions of voters."

Matthew Arnold's new volume of poems receives great praise from leading London journals. The London Review says that "Mr. Arnold's New Poems," are marked by such beauties of description and thought, and such power of art, as we can find in no other living poet but Tennyson."

Key, who is always getting himself into trouble, says Byron plagiarized from Shakspeare, whom he pretended not to like, and proves it in this wise:

"Not that I loved Cæsar less, but that I loved Rome more.
—Shakspeare.

"I love not the man less but nature more."—Byron.

Charles Henry Webb, the author of "Liffith Lank," has been writing a series of pleasant gossippy letters from Saratoga and Niagara, which have been lately appearing in the New York Tribune.

Speaking of the Grant correspondence, the Boston Advertiser says:

"Careful inquiry concerning the same, leaves scarcely any doubt but that the President furnished it for publication, while in a condition similar to that in which he was when he took the oath office."

[For the Californian.]

A VALEDICTORY.

A COOL, delicious valley, a gently sloping mountain, whose distant summit my straining eyes can scarcely reach. A petulant child clinging close upon the skirts of its wearied mother; bright eyes, laughing through tears; ponting lips and dimpled shoulders—tenderly the care-worn woman loosens the dimpled hands—gathers closer her dusky drapery and floats away. A sweet odor of clover blossoms steals up the valley—swollen angry streams shrink to winding silver threads, and the clinging moss creeps down beside them. For a moment the wayward child, with sad eyes, looks back—one faint regretful sigh sends a little shiver through every bare tree-twig, and then she turns with radiant face to revel in her new-found pleasures. Now she blows tiny-bubbly clouds that skim in endless shapes along the horizon—she flings violets with a reckless hand; the daisy and crocus nestle at her feet. She laughs at you, she frets, she scorns you—she gives you a tress of her fragrant hair to caress—she pelts you with blossoms—she covers her face and weeps. The mantle falls, and lo! voluptuous Summer stands tip-toe with rosy mouth upturned. Earth feels the throb of her warm bosom. Balls of purple and amber cloud roll low along the hills to kiss her feet—ripples of sunlight shoot everywhere through the Heavens. Soft music floats on the drowsy air—the locust hums a dreamy song—birds twitter and chirrup in shadowy nooks—on the ear falls the tinkle and tuneful plash of distant fountains. How the tuber-rose slowly unfolds her waxen leaves, and precious odors steal from her heart to toy with the wanton winds. The vine bends low beneath its lucious burden; I pluck and eat; I drink the new pressed wine, and feel its life in every vein. "Live while you live"—I fill and drink again. It is noon—beneath the golden glare my slumberous eyelids droops;—here could I rest and dream forever. Again I inhale the ambrosial breath—the soft arms entwine and gently urge me "on." I see the pinnacle nearer and nearer, though distant still and dipped in feathery mist. Bright castles rise among its floating folds and die again. Softer, sweeter the music—subtler the perfumes that rise beneath my careless feet. Softer—fainter still. The sun rolls down from his meridian, and the blazing oars now strike my path—but here and there. A sudden cool wind chills my blood—another step—another—I stand upon the mountain top alone! Behind me an impenetrable curtain—before me the sombre gray of an Autumn sky! Sad maiden, pale and passionless, with sighing plaintive voice. The descent is steep and rugged—the beauty, the warmth, the glorious castles, are vanished. The base lies under heavy hanging clouds, and I hear the careless roll of a distant river. Come back! oh, come back! A pitying hand for a moment lifts the veil. Dim, dim, and far off, but beautiful still. The golden sun is shining—fruit hangs rare—ripe on vine and tree—revelry and merriment there. I am not even missed, and my mistress woos others with as loving a kiss as ever she gave to me. Along the flower-fringed path where once I strayed, some plants have drooped and died—beside each withered stalk is raised a monument—I read the inscription, "Neglected Opportunity;" and others come, with pruning knife and ruthless hand, to disinter my sacred dead and plant an emblem of their own. Oh! cruel hand drop the veil—better far the rugged road and steel gray sky! Adieu, caprecious, happy Spring! Adieu, sweet breath'd Summer! Farewell, O dazzling Youth, thou wilt come again "no more, forever."

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

EVERY night during the week Maguire's Opera House has been crowded. The engagement of Dan Bryant promises to prove an even more successful one than that of Edwin Adams. On Wednesday evening, The Bells of Shandon, by John Brougham, was produced. There are some original situations, and some lively dialogue in this play, but there is much of the sameness and hackneyed sentiment which characterises the Irish drama. It will be played this afternoon. The bill for this evening's entertainment is The Bells of Shandon and Handy Andy.

Stage manager Graves has prepared a rich and varied bill of fare for next week. On Monday and Tuesday, Rory O'Moore and More Blunders Than One, will be played. On Wednesday, The Colleen Bawn; and on Thursday, Ireland As It Is. The Irish Nation will also be played during the week.

On Monday, according to announcement, the great Ha-yah-takee troupe of Japanese performers, made their appearance at the Metropolitan Theatre. The house was filled with people packed as closely together as sardines. The receipts amounted to over $1200. That Ha-yah-takee is the most wonderful balancer in the world, is probably true. I cannot imagine his being surpassed. The stage was fitted up in the most original and splendid style. The feats were all wonderful and amusing, yet for all this, I fear that the American managers, who have speculated in Hah-yah-takee stock, have bought a pig in a poke, and regret their bargain. Ha-yah-takee would not inform any one what he intented to do on the first night, he would give no programme, he only pledged his word—the word of the great Ha-yah-takee—that the entertainment should be in every respect wonderful; he would entertain no suggestions, would tolerate no interference. The management were powerless; Ha-yah-takee had to take his own course. The consequence was, that although he performed many wonderful feats, he quite tired out the patience of his audience. On the ensuing night he consented to cut the talking portion of his entertainment short, and to give fewer repetitions of feats. Every night the performance has improved, and every night the house has been crowded. If the Ha-yah-takee troupe could remain here for a few weeks longer, I have no doubt their entertainment would be sufficieutly Californianized, and the tediousness, which at first characterized it, would be quite done away with. One of the most wonderful of the performances is the bridge feat. Ha-yah-takee balances on his feet two bamboos, each thirty feet long, which support an imitation basket. A little boy climbs up each bamboo, and the two perform a variety of feats; after which they creep up into the basket. After some few minutes interval, during which the boys are engaged in changing their clothes, (in the basket, all this time balanced on the feet of Ha-yah-takee,) the bamboos fly apart and the basket is transformed into a bridge, on which the boys perform posturing feats, and finally each hangs by one leg from one end of the bridge. This is decidedly the most wonderful balancing feat ever performed. The bamboo bridge, and two boys together, weigh about 180 pounds and this weight Ha-yah-takee balances on his feet twenty-four minutes. Several changes were made in the programme during the week. This afternoon a selection of the most popular performances will be given. To-night this troupe will give their last performance in San Francisco. An immense programme has been prepared Two tremendous feats will be performed. Ha-yah-takee will balance on his feet a tree, on which three boys will go through a series of trapeze gymnastic peformances; and he will also execute his wonderful walk over lanterns on a swinging platform. In addition to these and other great feats, Mrs. Ha-yah-takee will dance on the slack-rope. As this is the last opportunity which will be afforded the citizens of San Francisco of witnessing this really wonderful performance, I am afraid that many who are anxious to see it will be unable to obtain admission. Seats can be secured during the day without extra charge.

Mrs. Charles Poole, an actress from Australia, arrived in this city on Sunday, from Melbourne, via Panama.

TOUCHSTONE.

ITALIAN OPERA.—Donizetti's L'Elisire d' Amor, was performed at the American Theatre, on Thursday evening, for the farewell benefit of Signorina Brambilla, who sustained the character of "Adina" to the satisfaction of a crowded and fashionable house. Signor Morley sang his best as the love-sick "Nemorino;" Signor Mancusi was immense as "Dulcamara," and M. Charles did very well as "Sergeant Belcore." The duet between Brambilla and Mancusi, in the third act, was unanimously encored, as was also the lady's rendering of "Il Bacio," substituted for the regular finale of the opera.

THE CITY GARDENS.—The rainy season is approaching, therefore, all should derive as much enjoyment as possible from the short period of sunshiny weather which yet remains. These pleasant days may be thoroughly enjoyed in the City Gardens, amidst flowers, birds, and rare animals. Improvements are being constantly made; every day some new attraction is added. The restaurant department under the charge of Nick, formerly of the Washington Restaurant, is very complete, and many go out for the purpose of dining at the City Gardens.

WOODWARD'S GARDEN'S.—These beautiful grounds are in fine condition at present. The zoological collection has had many additions made to it; the conservatories are full of flowers, the museum contains thousands of curiosities, and the Art Gallery is a very popular feature. On Saturday and Sunday music is added to the other attractions, a fine concert being given by some of the best instrumental performers in the city.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—This institution is thoroughly appreciated by the citizens of San Francisco, and is visited by thousands from all parts of the State. The popular lectures on physiology and the laws of health, which are delivered every evening, are instructive and entertaining.

"JOHN PAUL," in a letter from Niagara Falls to the Springfield Republican says:

"It is really very singular how few clothes one wants on a journey, if he's good-looking, and how little money he can get along with, if he has only got style into him, and a moderate amount of cheek. Why, I know a chap who traveled from Chicago to New York without costing him a cent—indeed he came out a new hat ahead when he arrived at his destination."

CALIFORNIA.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

O fair young land, the youngest, fairest far
Of which our world can boast—
Whose guardian planet, Evening's silver star,
Illumes thy golden coast.—

How art thou conquered, tamed in all the pride
Of savage beauty still!
How brought, O panther of the splendid hide,
To know thy masters will!

No more thou sittist on thy tawny hills
In indolent repose:
Or pourest the chrystal of a thousand rills
Down from thy house of snows.

But where the wild oats wrapped the knees in gold,
The ploughman drives his share,
And where, through cañons deep, thy streams are rolled,
The miner's arm is bear.

Yet in thy lap, thus rudely rent and torn,
A nobler seed shall be:
Mother of mighty men, thou shalt not mourn
Thy lost virginity!

Thy human children shall restore the grace
Gone with thy fallen pines;
The wild, barbaric beauty of thy face
Shall round to classic lines,

And Order, Justice, Social Law shall curb
Thy untamed energies;
And Art and Science, with their dreams superb,
Replace thine ancient case.

The marble, sleeping in thy mountains now,
Shall live in sculptures rare;
Thy native oak shall crown the sage's brow—
The bay, the poet's hair.

Thy tawny hills shall bleed their purple wine,
Thy valleys yield their oil;
And Music, with her eloquence divine,
Persuade thy sons to toil.

Till Hesper, as he trims his silver beam,
No happier land shall see,
And Earth shall find her old Arcadian dream
Restored again in thee!

Musical Taste in San Francisco.

There are, sad to say, many persons who have objected to the Japanese music at the Metropolitan Theatre—in fact there are only a select few who can appreciate its beauties. The enlightened press of San Francisco which should lead in matters of art, has shown a terrible lack of appreciation of Eastern melody, and has displayed its ignorance by a sweeping condemnation of that which possessed many features deserving of praise. The plaintive melodies of the Japanese, no doubt, to the uncultured ear appear mere discord, as did L'Africaine to the majority of our population. But still we maintain that in light melodies, expressive of (Japanese) pleasure, grief or pain, these newly-arrived artistes excel. The musical artists have had to struggle against much professional jealousy evinced in quarters where we should least have expected it to manifest itself. Professor Herold declares that he could produce better music from a two-year-old Steinway piano than any Japanese could elicit from the two-hundred-year-old drum, distorted banjos and clumsy bones which formed the impedimenta of their minstrel company. This is very wrong. It is un-Christian. Frank Howson, Jr., declared that he didn't like the musical portion of the Japanese entertainment and dropped a hint about his violincello solo being "far better than Mrs. Ha-yah-takee's tum-tumming." When the soft voices of the female chorus rose in a supplicatory hymn to the Great God of all. Master Sein-Se-Ketchie risked his life, the audience laughed. We maintain the fact that there has been much music performedby the Japanese minstrels diunrg the past week. The Irish are terriby afraid of the Chinese usurping their honorable positions as hod-carriers and sand-shovellers. In like manner all the musicians and singers of San Francisco have tried to "run down" the orchestral music supplied by the talented artistes who have accompanied the Ha-yah-takee troupe. It is a horrid shame.

A Fair Question.

A series of "questions for the supporters of Fitzgerald" appear in the Bulletin of Friday, over the signature of "Sect-Hater." We wish to ask "Sect-Hater" this question. "To what sect do you belong?"

HOWEVER high we rise, we should lure others upward to the same heights by gushing melodies of our lips and hearts.

"THE love of money is the root of all evil," and the root, like those of the cancer, is generally ineradicable.

GENUINE CHAMPAGNE.—It is now pretty generally understood that but little genuine champagne has ever found its way to the shores of America. Here are well manufactured articles in bottles adorned with blazing labels and big names, but still these are not champagnes. We can manufacture in California a champagne equal to many of the imported brands. All that is necessary to ensure success is a careful selection of the wine fit for the purpose. Isidor Landsberger, who received the premium at the last State Fair, for fine native wines and liquors, has carried the art of making sparkling wine to a high pithe of perfection. The manufactory is at 429 Jackson street, and every week many pipes of California wine are changed into champagne, sparkling Moselle, sparkling Hock, and other wines; all who have tasted confess that this home-made surpasses much of the imported article.

WAX FLOWERS.—There are many idle ladies in San Francisco, who are at a loss how to occupy their time. These ladies had better pay a visit to Mrs M. E. Gerrish and take a few lessons in the beautiful art of wax-flower making, and that other accomplishment at present so fashionable in Europe, welcomanse. Mrs. Garrish received the premium for wax-flowers at the last State Fair.

A DAY ON THE DEEP SEA.

I DON'T think deep-sea fishing is open to the old sneer about a line with a worm at one end and a fool at the other. In the first place, a worm is rarely used at one end; and in the next, when it comes to hauling in a big fish of sixty pounds or so, that will pull like a baker, fight like a man, and oark like a dog, something better than a fool is needed at the other end.

The day's fishing alluded to in my title I enjoyed (sic) during a visit to Guernsey in the Autumn of last year. Considering what capital sport sea-fishing really is, and the facilities afforded for its practice by our coasts, it is a subject of surprise that a pastime so readily accessible should be so generally ignored.

Down at "Point," I found out an old fisherman, and made known my desire to accompany him on his next turn. The Guernsey peasantry and laborers, with scarcely an exception, possess a native gentleness and ease of manner that go far to corroberate their claim as descendants of Huguenot refugees of high birth. Most of them speak good English, with a very pretty accent as well as a somewhat nnintelligible patois of Norman-French. Guernsey folk have a much neater way of getting you to repeat a request than an abrnpt British "Eh?" or "What?" or the still more nnceremonious "What say?"

"What do you please?" asked the old man, not quite nnderstanding my proposition.

I told him I "pleased" fishing, not delicate fine-weather sport, but a genuine experience of real rough fisherman's fishing. It took a vast amount of persuasion to induce old Pierre Jacquelines to allow me to go with him. There "weren't much fish," 'twas "a bad tide," "too much sea on," "didn't know if he should get bait," and so on. In point of fact, there was a deal of "sea on" at the time, and being not a little doubtful of my own ability to stand such a quantity, perhaps I should have been less anxious to press the matter, but feeling a little piqued at the old man's reluctance to go. He gave way at last, however (almost to try my chagrin, I own, for there certainly was a deal of "sea on,") and trotted off with me to the qnay to get some bait. Detaching one from many small egg-shaped wicker baskets I saw moored to stakes in the water, he opened it and showed me the bait—writhing, glancing little sand-eels, of the sort known as "sand-launce," which glistened like silver and purple in the water. Making the basket fast to the stern of a boat, old Pierre bade me step in and rowed off to his fishing smack, a large, wide, flat-bottomed craft, drawing scarce a foot of water, built very strong and stiff to withstand heavy seas, and carrying two little sails, with peaks, schooner-wise, bnt without fore-sheet or jib.

On board we found the old man's "boy," "young Pierre," as he called him—a bronzed, stalwart child indeed, tall, and broad-chested and forty, if a day. Their first care was to make me into a waterproof parcel by wrapping me up in oil-cloths and canvass, and neatly tying me round and across with twine, explaining as they did so that they "expected it wettish." Next, each of the two fishermen went down into an enormous pair of leggings, which came up and tied round their necks with a string, like a long two-legged bag having arm-holes. A great slouchy oilskin coat, with a high collar that fitted in under their canvass hats, completed their armor.

Would I steer? Wouldn't I? I caught at the chance, for rough as it was, even a tiller was something to hold on by. Well, our course was a mile out, by those rocks; I should like to see a buoy there—that was their buoy, and there was their "trot"—all I had to do was to make for the buoy, and "keep her to the wind." That was all very well, but it seemed as though we should never keep the craft to the water, she had such an unaccountable propensity for mounting up skywards, and trying to leap right out of the sea, then rushing down into a wave, and hurtling over the next one, much as a young bird trying to fly. However, I endeavored to put a good face on it, and asked the men if they would have some tobacco.

"Please?" inquired old Pierre interrogatively, meaning, as I found, "what did I please?" and not "thank you." I therefore repeated my offer, somewhat rashly adding that for my own part, I required a pretty constaut supply of the weed. "No, please," they didn't smoke; and if I intended to do so, I had better be quick about it. The same idea occurred to me simultaneously, for we were pitching about at such a wild rate I could not predicate with any degree of certainty that a few minutes more would find me in the same mind.

"Keep her up to it, sir," said the fisherman, encouragingly. She was already so much "up to it," that the water came splashing in sheets over us all, nearly blinding me as to where we were going; she was so much "up to it,' that I could seldom see anything ahead of us but some great crested hill of glistening water, up which our boat was always going to climb, or poised for a moment on its top before darting down with a swash and a hiss into the seathing valley below. She was so much "up to it," in fact, that when the first wave that washed over us had put out my pipe, nearly washing it down my throat into the bargain, I let it go without a pang.

"Hi, now sir, steady? Here we are. Sharp up to the wind when I say now—now?" As I put up the helm, young Pierre grappled the buoy, and the old man struck the masts, leaving us tossing about with one end of the "trot" across our bows. Tho "trot" or "bolter," as is sometimes called, is a strong line, a rope indeed, some three hundred yards long, from which depend four or five hundred hooks. snooded on strong water-cord, or wired strands at regular intervals of about two feet. It is buoyed across the run of the tide, secnred in its place by a grapnel, and floated by large corks, which dot out its track in the sea. In this position it becomes like a long row of baited meat-hooks, on which the fish come and hang themselves up. We commenced what is called "under-running the trot," that is to say, hauling the "trot" over our boat, taking off the fish, and fresh baiting the hooks with offal and pieces of mackerel and shad.

We had a pretty good haul, for there were a John Dory, two or three fine turbot, numbers of brill and several great gaping skate of twenty pounds and more apiece, besides mackerel, and pollack and smaller fry. The two first named sorts and some of the largest brill are what the fishermen term "royal fish." Nearly all of them find their way to the London market which depends in a great measure for its supply on Guernsey and the other Channel Islands. These great flat fish are not easily unhooked by a novice, having great strength in their tails, wherewith they can give the unwary a severe blow. The skate especially is a very ugly customer to deal with in more senses than one, for it is the most hideous fish that swims. However, our fishermen put one hand into their great gills, throwing them one by one into a kind of tank that is "forrard," in a very matter-of fact sort of, way, occassionally administering a blow with an iron pin to some fish more nnruly than the rest. Having baited and laid down our "trot" again, (I may mention it is an offense punishable with transportation to haul another person's "trot,") we step our masts and set sail for more active fishing, in which we meditate hooking the fish, instead of leaving it to them to hook themselves.

Our fishing-ground is thirteen miles off, right at the back of the island, so we have a long run before us. We go down with the tide, keeping well out from land, since the island is so rocky it is dangerous to coast it when there is much "sea." We fish at low water and about two hours into the "young flood" (these being the universal sea-fishing hours,) and come back again at night with the return of tide.

Dnring a three hours' sail, tacking down against the wind, my whole energies were devoted to holding on, to prevent, on the one hand being pitched head first into the fishing tank "forrard," and, on the other, so to manage to dodge the waves that broke over us, as to avoid being washed over the stern. Now and then, I believe, I made a sickly attempt to smile, but so palbably artificial was the effort, that on every such occasion old Pierre would ask if I didn't feel well. I kept on assuring him I was quite well in so marked a manner that he invariably recommended me to try and nibble a biscuit and take a drop of brandy. It being utterly impossible to follow his advice, since when I opened my mouth a wave was sure to fill it, carrying biscuit and brandy to the fishes, I gave up the attempt in despair, and framed some utterly transpaent excuse (but which I thonght wholly inscrutable at the time) for abandoning the helm. I then took to contemplating the sky, doubtless with a very fixed expression of countenance, until I became so giddy I could not tell which was the sky and which was sea, for the billowy clouds were heaving and rolling like the water. Fully aware of feeling very particularly unwell, I was actually debating in my miud about offering the meu a handsome consideration to toss me overboard, when a violent lurch of the boat hurled me right across into old Pierre's lap. With consummate coolness, the old fellow merely inquired, "What did I please?"

The exclamation "Oh!" is a word peculiarly adapted to sufferers, because though a short one, you may make a great deal out of it by sighing it out in a helplessly lugubrious drawl, as I believe I did. What I am afraid I meant by it at the time was, "Oh! fisherman, fisherman!—take all the ready money about my person, only take me up quick, and put mo ashore." I think he must have so understood it, for he replied:

"Bear np sir—it is all right; we have reached our fishing-ground and there's a capital tide. Bring her to, my son," this to Pierre junior, (the vessel he meant, not me; I was beyond "bringing to" at the time, and nearer "bringing up.") Look out for our marks—Pleinmount Cave and the white house in a line, one mile out. So let go the anchor!"

I listened in a most uncomfortable kind of trance, my deliberate opinion being at the moment that all the fish in the sea were worth nothing in comparison to the blessedness of setting foot once more on dry land. I remember they scuffled about a good bit in getting the sails down, and I was vaguely conscions of the grating noise the anchor chain made in running out. Then we were left tossing on a heaving ground swell, np and down, lurch, down, roll, up, lurch. When we went down, the boat seemed to sink away from underneath, falling quicker than I did, and always in the opposito direction to that for which I was prepared, dodging all my efforts to accommodate myself to its motion. Our craft had "heaved to and reached." So had I, and forthwith commenced throwing myself overboard by installments. Oh! my brothers and sisters who know what it is to be sea-sick, paradox it may seem to others, not so to you, you are all very well so long as you can be ill; it is when you can't you are truly and deplorably bad. The study of anatomy teaches that the human heart and the human liver are intimately connected with the human larynx by certain cords and membranes. You may learn the same truth from sea-sickness in half the time, and in a more convincing manner, realizing experimentally and beyond donbt that your heart and your liver have strings to them and get pulled into your throat, and go up and down like the boat, only always going down when the boat goes up, and coming up when it goes down. Then you begin to feel the truth of the proverb, "Hope comes to all except the lost and the sea-sick."

I was ronsed from a painful lethargy by the sound of something whizzing and spinning in the boat. It was a snipe-billed gore-fish, dancing and pirouetting and entangling the fisherman's line—the first fish. To my sickly notion, it looked ill and giddy, as I was—it did me good to see any living thing in the same plight—and when Pierre senior put three lines into my hand my fingers certainly closed on them, though in a helpless kind of a way. I noticed, even then, they were horsehair lines, nearly a quarter of an inch in diameter, beautifully plaited like a hair watch-gnard, loaded at every yard, and baited with sand-launce. I believe Pierre explained they were weighted with lead sinkers of from six to eighteen pounds apiece, to counteract the strength of the tide, and to remain at different depths, the lightest almost floating. When he brought me a stout cord in addition, the thickness of flag halliards, having a large meat-hook at the end baited with slices of mackerel, and balanced with thirty pounds of lead for bottom fishing, and whispered in my ear the magic word "conger!" I certainly felt better; the prospect of the excitement of getting a good conger "on" almost giving me an appetite on the spot.

The first good tug at my horsehair lines acted on me like a strong tonic, and I was surprised how soon I forgot all the ailments of the sea in the busy employment of hanling home dancing gore-fish, and mackerel weighing three or four pounds and whiting pollack of eight or ten as fast as ever I could get them into the boat, bait my hooks with fresh eels, and get the lines out again. We were all three fishing, and in the course of an hour I should judge we had upwards of forty fine fish of different sorts, which is rather more rapid sport than the fresh water fisherman experiences, whilst most of the fish fight as gamely as trout. The excitement by this time made me disregard all the pitching of the boat or the drenchings of occassional waves. Then came a tug at the conger line, like a strong ringer pulling a bell. Dropping all the others, I held on with both hands.

"Give him line, sir," said Pierre; "let him run, bnt mind he has no slack; steady!" he cried, as he saw the cord run through my fingers so fast that it made them burn and tingle again. "Steady! he's too good a fish to lose," and he came to my assistance. Whenever our fish slacked the cord by doubling, we hauled on him, keeping a gentle hand on his mouth, but giving him his head when he was inclined to bolt, and managing him like a restive horse. He certainly pulled like one. It was as much as ever my entire strength could hold him. I asked old Pierre what he judged the weight of the fish to be? "Near upon seventy pounds, sir," he replied; "but it is time he was in the boat, and we knew for certain."

We tired master conger a bit by letting him run and half drown himself; then gradually shortening his line till we got sight of him—great, black, writhing serpent that he was, lashing up the foam with his tail, and barking at us fiercely when his head came out of water. Pierre soon struck him with our gaff-hook, and we pulled his twining carcase into the boat. He measured over seven feet long, and the old man's estimate of his weight was not exaggerated. Our conger was a very savage fish—he gnashed his teeth at us even when held down with the gaff-hook, and young Pierre, for my instruction, presented him with a piece of wood to bite. on which he pretty soon left the marks of his teeth. It is said congers will bite fingers with even greater relish—of which fact I have little doubt. We despatched our prize by first stunning him, and than cutting the back of his neck so as to divide the spine.

As the tide began to "make," we got np anchor and ran back before the wind—pretty smooth sailing in comparison to what we experienced before—whilst I resumed my place at the helm, old Pierre making me steer through masses of sunken rocks that gleamed np past us every minute in a way that made me highly nervous, in spite of his quick eye, lest a wrong turn of the tiller should bring us upon them. However, the old man consoled me with the assurance that after all six inches was very good clearance from a rock, and reminded me I had been a long time without a pipe. This was quite true, in spite of my boast, and I was not a little glad of the triumphant excuse that my tobacco was wet, my lights spoiled, and my pipe gone. The old fellow was determined to accommodate me though, for he drew out from his locker some fine honey-dew and a dry box of lucifers, loaded a clean "cutty," and tendered a light. I was better, very much better, but really doubted if I could face a pipe just now without a relapse. Still, as it wouldn't do to be beat, I managed just to keep it alight, bnt hereby testify never before or since to have smoked a pipe in such dreadful discomfort.

When we got ashore, I felt for'l the world like a preserved New York lobster, for my oil-skin wrappings not only kept a great deal of salt water outside, but held a great deal of water inside, which had washed down my neck and remained bottled up in the waterproofing. In fact, when I came to be opened and tapped, it was surprising to see how much seawater was concealed about my person.

Our conger duly appeared next day in the Guernsey fish-market. Old Pierre had particularly wished me to try some of him for soup, assuring me I should not know it from turtle—it 's indeed stated to be really very good—but Guernsey market provided something I preferred to conger, that is to say, a hind-quarter of native lamb, weighing only three pounds seven ounces; the whole side, indeed, weighed but seven and a quarter pounds. The flavor of Guernsey lamb would have been delicious to a more delicate appetite than my day's fishing had provided for me.—All the Year Round.

BABBITTONIAN,
OR SELF-TEACHING
PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he couldat much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excelleucies of this System, it is—

1—Scentific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Uncxcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

TOUCHING INCIDENT.

A correspondent of the Philadelphia City Item who has been "doing" Niagara and Saratoga, met with a touching incident on the cars. He relates it in good style: Near your correspondent sat a handsome young woman of five and-twenty. She was tastefully dressed, but appeared sad and troubled. I offered her a glass of Carte D'or and some luncheon, which she politely declined. Encouraged by her amiability, I said—"Excuse me—perhaps I am too bold—but, ahem—are you a married woman?" With native artlessness she replied—"No, sir; to the best of my knowledge and belief I am a maiden!" "If I may judge from the sad expression of your face," I continued, "the story of your life must be very interesting?" "It is," she responded; "but I cannot give it to you in detail, as my journey will be at an end in half an hour. Let me say briefly, that I loved early and wisely, but my intended was thrown from a horse and killed. My second lover fell at Gettysburg. The third died of typhoid, and the fourth became a victim to that "hope deferred which maketh the heart sick," and died only last week. Andrew Johnson promised him a good office in Rochester, but Andrew recklessly broke his word, (as he is in the habit of doing,) and my poor swain became mortified, sickened, and died." "And what do you propose to do?" I inquired. "Nothing but watch and wait," was the courageous response, as she lifted her crinoline and tripped out of the cars.

AN ASSISTANT CONDUCTOR.—One of our readers, the other day, seeing a paragraph about two young gentlemen of Charleston shipping before the mast, was reminded of two young friends of his in Mississippi, who, finding on their return home that their "expectations" had disappeared, leaving nothing but their paroles, heroically "accepted the situation" of brakesmen, on a railroad. By and by they found themselves in Jackson, with a brief interval of leisure, which they invested in call on some of their lady friends, by whom they were cordially received. It was already known, or soon discovered, that they were railroad men, and a young lady asked one of our heroes what his position was. From the rough experience of past years he had learned that in the eyes of the world station makes the man, and being a little doubtful how a knowledge of his actual employment would be received, replied that he was a "check agent." "And what are you?" was the question to his comrade. He had a moment to think, and answered that he was "assistant conductor.' "But," said the fair querist, "I did not know that there was more than one conductor." "Oh, yes," was the ready answer, "Pete Kirby starts the train and I stop it."—Mobile Times.

AYER'S AGUE CURE,

FOR THE SPEEDY CURE OF

Intermittent Fever, or Fever and Ague, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical Headache, or Bilious Fevers, indeed for the whole Class of Diseases originating in Biliary Derangement, Caused by the Malaria of Miasmatic Countries.

No one remedy is louder called for by the necessities of the American people than a sure and safe cure for Fever and Ague. Such we are now enabled to offer, with a perfect certainty that it will eradicate the disease, and with assurance founded on proof, that no harm can arise from its use in any quantity.

That which protects from or prevents this disorder must be of immense service in the communities where it prevails. Prevention is better than cure, for the patient escapes the risk which he must run in violent attacks of this baleful distemper. This "Cure" expels the miasmic poison of Fever and Ague from the system, and prevents the development of the disease, if taken on the first approach of the premonitary symptoms. It is not only the best remedy ever yet discovered for this class of complaints, but also the cheapest. The large quantity we supply for a dollar brings it within reach of every body, and in the bilious districts, where Fever and Ague prevails, everybody should have it and use it freely both for cure and prevention. A great superiority of this remedy over any other ever discovered for the speedy and certain cure of Intermittents is, that it contains in Quinine or mineral, consequently it produces no quinsmo or other injurious effects whatever upon the constitution. Those cured by it are left as healthy as if they had never had the disease.

Fever and Ague is not alone the consequence of the miasmatic poison. A great variety of disorders arise from its irritation, among which are Neuralgia, Rheumatism, Gout, Headache, Blindness, Toothache, Earache, Catarrh, Asthma, Palpitation, Painful Affection of the Spleen, Hysterics, Pain in the Bowels, Colic, Paralysis, and Derangement of the Stomach, all of which, when originating in this cause, put on the intermittent type, or become periodical. This "Cure" expels the poison from the blood, and consequently cures them all alike.

A BRIEF BIOGRAPHY.

Perhaps the briefest personal memoirs ever written were the "Memoirs of Count Roptopchin;" written in ten minutes. We subjoin a few paragraphs, each of which constitute a "chapter."

My Birth.—On the twelfth of March, seventeen hundred and sixty-five, I emerged from darkness into the light of day. I was measured, I was weighed, I was baptized. I was born without knowing wherefor, and my parents thanked Heaven without knowing for what.

My Education.—I was taught all sorts of things, and learned all sorts of languages. By dint of impudence and quackery, I sometimes passed for a savan. My head has become a library of old volumes, of which I keep the key.

My Suffering.—I was tormented by my masters; by tailors who made tight dresses for me; by women, ambition, self-love, by useless regrets, and by remembrances.

Memorable Epochs.—At the age of thirty, I gave up dancing; at forty, my endeavors to please the fair sex; at fifty, my regard of public opinion; at sixty, the trouble of thinking; and I have now become a true sage, or egotist, which is the same thing.

Respectable Principles.—I have never meddled with any marraiges or scandal. I have never recommended a cook or a physician; and, consequently, have never attempted the life of any one.

My Dislikes.—I have a dislike to softs and fops, and to intriguing women, who make a game of virtue; a disgust of affectation; pity for made-up men and painted women; an aversion to rats, liquors, metaphysics, rhubarb, and terror of justice and wild beasts.

Analysis of my Life.—I await death without fear and without impatience. My life has been a bad melodrama on a grand stage, where I have played the hero, the tyrant, the nobleman, but never the vault.

My Epitaph.—Here lies, in hope of repose, an old deceased man, with a worn out spirit, an exhausted heart, and a used-up body. Ladies and gentleman, pass on!

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL

ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner porperty worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.
BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say: "It is, therefore, now the settled law, that the municipal lands held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."
Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.
E. L. B. BROOKS,
Attorney and Counsellor at Law.

THE WILLCOX & GIBBS SEWING MACHINES

Have taken over Two Hundred First Premiums within two seasons, including the Highest Prize at the grand trial

with the Florence at the great Union Fair, New York, at which trial the Florence was overwhelmingly defeated.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE

FLORENCE AND WILLCOX & GIBBS.

THE

TRIUMPHANT!

At the Great UNION FAIR, held at Island Park, between Albany and Troy, in September, two Premiums were offered on Sewing Machines, one for the BEST and the other for the "Second Best"—competition being open to the State.

On the first day of the Fair, the Troy Agent of Florence Sewing Machine Company, having, jointly with the Albany Agent of the same Machine, entered it for competition, published in the Troy Daily Times a challenge to Agents of other Sewing Machines, to meet them at said Fair and compete with them for the Premium.

The challenge was accepted by the Troy and Albany Agents of the Willcox and Gibbs Machine.

Each party was to prepare and subject to the judges a "list" of the several "points of merit" on account of which "superiority" was claimed. These "points were to be separately considered, thoroughly investigated and practically tested, by work done then and there, upon each of the machines; and then decided in favor of the machine which was adjudged to excel on that "point."

Finally it was agreed that the machine which, at the conclusion of the trial, should be found to have the greatest number of those "points" decided in its favor should be decided the "BEST SEWING MACHINE," and awarded the FIRST PREMIUM.

The result of the trial was, that the

WILLCOX & GIBBS WON THE VICTORY

and the prize, by the extraordinary superiority of thirty-five points, decided in its favor, against two points in favor of the Florence.

Full notes were taken of the trial.

It is a fact worthy of remark, that during the entire trial—which continued without intermission for nearly seven hours—not a stitch was missed, nor the thread once broken, nor a needle broken or bent, by the Willcox and Gibbs machine. No kind of work was attempted to be done on it that was not accomplished, and done in a perfect and workmanlike manner; and no effort was made on it that was not entirely successful; while neither of these statements can be truly made in favor of the Florence.

This remarkable trial can not fail, through the facts developed by it, to be productive of important results. It has raised the veil and exposed to public view the true character of the opposition, who will no longer be able to deceive the public by misrepresenting the character and merits of the Willcox and Gibbs machine.

It is an improvement on double thread machines; and its "stitch," which was severely tested by the Judges, was decided to be much stronger and less liable to rip in use or wear than the "Lock Stitch."

It is the simplest in construction—does the greatest variety of work—makes no noise—is not liable to get out of order—costs the least money, and gives the best satisfaction.

☞ Full reports of this trial sent free to any address.

BROKEN VOWS.

BY A POLICE REPORTER.

At the Police Court, yesterday morning, John and Henry Cook were charged with uttering threats against the life of Mr. Burkard. The three were well dressed and respectable looking young men.

Mr. Burkard said: "Until a week ago, your Honor, I was eogaged to be married to Sally, the sister of the prisoners. I will not speak ill of her, though we are enemies now, for it was owing to my engagement that I took the pledge and am a sober man. You see I was drunk when I proposed and was accepted. That showed me to what liquor could bring a mao, and I at once took the pledge. I was engaged to her three months, and during that time I did my duty. I visited her daily, took her to places of amusement, and told her sweet lies. In fact, I did everything required, except to name the marriage day. In that I procrastinated. I told her she did not know me well enough yet, that the weather was too warm, that she had better wait until the cholera season was over, but it did no good. She insisted that we should be married before Mary B——, and she would be.

"I became desperate. I had no intention of marrying her or any one else. I know what matrimony is; I have been whipped by my father because my mother has happened to caress me. Not knowing what else to do, I pretended to be drunk when visiting Sally eight days ago. She had some friends with her in the parlor, and that pleased me. I kissed her, and tried to kiss them, male and female. Then I told her in a hiccoughy way that I had been unable to get the false hair and palpitating bosom she wished; that they cost to much.

"That did it. Indignant at thus apparently having her dearest secrets exposed to the young ladies and gentlemen there, she angrily told me to go; that I must never come near her again. Believe me, judge, I was happy to hear it, and left at once.

"I did not visit her, and three days afterward I received a note from her telling me she was sick and wished to see me. Not being a doctor I stayed away. The next day I received a similar note; my answer was the same.

"Then I received a note telling me I was a faithless brute, and a cruel wretch. That she had two big brothers, (I knew it.) and that they would at once avenge her wounded honor and broken heart by beating me. I believed her, and I have carefully avoided the big brothers. I am a law-abiding young man, and do not wish to fight. They have been to see me eight times already; I made the servant tell a lie—may God forgive me—and say I was out. But I know they will catch me, and then I shall feel very bad. To prevent that I have had them arrested. I wish them bound over to keep the peace; they can also keep their sister Sally. They have said they will kill me."

Justice—"You were right to have them arrested. They must each give bonds in the sum of $500 to keep the peace. As for you, sir, your conduct has been disgraceful. The name of my first love was Sally, and no one shall go back on a girl of that name. You are fined fifteen dollars."

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the estate of CLAUDE JACQUIN, deceased.

Order of Publication on application for order of sale.

On reading and filing the petition of William Rowan, administrator of the said estate, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of the said Administrator to pay the debts outstanding against the deceased, and the expenses of administration, and that it is necessary to sell the whole or some portion of the real estate of said deceased for the payment of such debts.

It is ordered, That all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court at the Court room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on TUESDAY, the first day of October, 1867, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the deceased as shall be necessary to pay such debts and expenses.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of the foregoing order be published once a week for four weeks, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a Newspaper published in the City and County aforesaid.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

August 30, A. D. 1867.

Office of the County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco.—I, Wm. Loewy, County Clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, and ex-officio Clerk of the Probate Court thereof, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true and correct copy of an order duly made and entered upon the minutes of the said Court.

Witness my hand, and the seal of said Court, this 30th day of August, A. D. 1867.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY AND County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of WILLIAM MacMICHAEL, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of Theodore L. Schell, the administrator, with the will annexed, of the estate of William MacMichael, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the legatees of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said William MacMichael, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on WEDNESDAY, the 9th day of October, Anno Domini 1867, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the legatees of the said William MacMichael, according to law.

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said ninth day of October, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

MARY ANN LEEDOM, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days; or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant, awarding the care and custody of her daughter Julia to plaintiff, and allowing her to resume her maiden name.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

MOUNTING A STAGE-COACH.

An awful wicked man—who, of course, is a correspondent for some newspaper—has been watching fairies in their flight from mother earth to the top of a stage-coach, and thus tells how it is done :

It is a sight to see these fair country women of ours climb to the top of a stage coach, as they do every day twenty times at Plymouth and Wolfsboro. This is how they do it: First there is a step-ladder placed against the forward wheel—four steps to it. The gentlemen escort takes the parasols.

There is a little blushing conference as to which of the party shall first scale the stage; it is settled, of course, in favor of the youngest. She gathers up her robe, leaving only the white embroidered skirt to fall to the top of her dear little garter, and there is just a tilt of her crinoline, like a wink, to show a purity of whiteness and tidyness and trimness, and before the suggestion has carried from your eye to your brain, with a movement like a pigeon's, she has flown to the top of the wheel. Modesty, hovering about her in the air, makes a windblow to her feet that close over the little soles the robe she has dropped again with a naive ingenuity. With a quick, spiral twirl of her body, the dress floats up to the dasher and lodges there, and she draws her feet into it up another step as a bird's feet retreat into its downy wings. Once more, for an instant, as she crosses the driver's seat to her own, a vision of proportions fall like a white love-letter in which there is only purity and naivete and maidenhood, with a photograph taken out of it—and then you see a rose-colored little face laughing down from its high perch, and a slim-gloved hand like a dove's foot, reaches down for its parasol, saying :

"My! how queer it is up here!" But see the jealous lover spoil all this art with his uncharitable busyness in and folding up his lady's robes. He don't deserve her! Fifty to one he will make a bad husband! He actually strangles the little feet, bags the limbs, clogs the movement of his lady, so that, perhaps, she stumbles, "barks" her poor shins, and really gets a cul de sac of shoe-string, harness, gown and brake, so that there is three times the ordinary exposure, and it serves young Greengills right. She sticks there like a swallow with a string to its leg, arrested when her flight was most graceful. Equally bad is the effort of the nervous woman to control her buskins. We don't want to see them. As a rule, men prefer to look the other way when such things make their unexpected phantom. But the nervous woman exaggerates the importance of her limbs. In the vain effort to think behind her and look before her, she flutters, blushes, hurries, slips, and at last, out of sheer tremulousness, one of her extremities is propelled by a luckless miss away down earthward, and what do we observe?

"I gad!" says the driver, irreverently, "there's a hair-pin dressed up!"

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.
QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.
Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secresy, and all Sexual Disorders.

TO THE AFFLICTED.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secresy.

TO FEMALES.
When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, they should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about their troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suits of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.
Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.
If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.
Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.,
San Francisco, Cal.

☞ SPERMATORRHŒA.
DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs
This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of SIX Cents in Postage stamps for return postage. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.

A RARE GEM OF ART.
"The Lord's Prayer,"
A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the
LAST SUPPER,
Reproducing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these minature groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphael's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of
OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.
Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

"You may talk to me of Baltimore and Philadelphia and New York, and their railroads and the trade of the Atlantic—let me tell you that the Pacific coast is already beginning to revolutionize the world."—Speech of the Hon. Wm. H. Seward to the people of Annapolis, Maryland, June, 1867.

ADDRESS

TO THE PERMANENT CITIZENS OF THE PACIFIC STATES AND TERRITORIES.

CITIZENS—We enjoy the finest country that the sun shines on, the most varied and fertile soil, the most extensive seaboard, and the greatest breadth of land having the richest metallic deposits possessed by any one nation of the earth, a land affording all the most varied material for manufactures, wools, hides, cotton, silk, coal, fibre-gums, wood, and, above all, abundance of every kind of food.

We are only a million of people, and yet have more land and set than Russia with sixty millions—more land than France and Germany with their hundred millions of people. In the face of these vast resources, there are towns crumbling to decay, men seeking without finding employment. Something wrong here or this would not be happening. Let us consider.

The instructed mind of the population is nearly devoted to political office-seeking. Their ambition is misdirected. The rising youth are trained to idleness. This mode of thinking and training must be reversed if we would hold this magnificent country against the incoming barbarian.

We must teach our youth the glories of manufactures, of commerce, of industry. We must nourish every effort, however rude, at manufacturing what we require. By devoting some of our capital and our young people to manufactures and general industries we shall soon become busy, get rich, bring more and more people into the country, create new wants, build up new factories and villages around them; cultivate more land, build more ships, generate more commerce, and thereby create profitable employment for all who want work.

Now, fellow-citizens, some money capital is required to help on this industrial movement. Where shall we get it? There is a considerable fund which we may divert from its present bed and channel, viz: the Insurance Fund.

Consider. The people of the Pacific States pay two hundred thousand dollars a month to the Insurance Companies for assuring them against losses from fire or shipwreck.

There are some fifteen of those Insurance offices in this city, each fishing for its share of this large fund. Each office pays a heavy rent, a half dozen officers and clerks, besides printing and advertising; the lowest cost is a thousand dollars a month on each office, and with some it is double that. There are too many persons employed in the business; too much dozing over newspapers; too much red tape and circumlocution; too high salaries and too little work. Think of two hundred thousand dollars a month! two millions and a half a year!! paid to those sleepy gentlemen for what little they do. This must be reformed. Three or four Insurance offices are quite enough for the million of scattered inhabitants of the Pacific States. A dozen of them may be abolished with great benefit to the community; some one or two have already withdrawn. This change would liberate some fifty men of education, whose business capacity would be of much greater service to the community in other branches of industry, such as manufactures, agriculture, commerce, the fisheries, the forests and the mines. This change would also divert a million or two of dollars to other and more needful industries, whereby a thousand fold more of national capital and employment would be generated than by the present drowsy system.

The managers of the Builders' Insurance propose, with the co-operation of the people, that this vast monthly stream of wealth shall be arrested and diverted to the aid of home manufactures, to effect a great reform and remove from the people's shoulders the expense of supporting a small army of insurance clerks and agents. The Builders' Insurance Company has passed through its first year (the most trying) with singular success. It has gathered a hundred thousand dollars, paid promptly all its losses, and established a business income of fully twenty thousand dollars a month! This has been done while we were yet but an experiment, and enjoying the confidence of only a portion of the public. We now appeal to the entire people. We ask them to send their insurance business to us on the following conditions, and soon we shall have an income of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS A MONTH, and here is what we shall do with the money:

First, we calculate, from our present experience, that we shall lose by fire and marine disasters half our monthly income (on our first year's experience our "losses" were but one-third of our income.)

Suppose then that our income shall be worked up to one hundred thousand dollars a month, and suppose that we shall pay out losses to the extent of fifty thousand dollars a month, we shall still have fifty thousand dollars a month to bank up, (or half a million a year.) We propose to make two parts of this sum—one part (a quarter of a million a year) to be invested in City Bonds, to protect the assured, and one part (about a quarter of a million a year) we propose to convert into a

MANUFACTURERS' LOAN FUND,

Which shall be lent exclusively to manufacturers on mortgage of their premises and machinery, at as low rate of interest and on as long time as is generally current on real estate.

By the aid of this fund the budding industries of the Pacific States may be nourished into active life; more and varied employments can be originated for the people; immigration may be welcomed and not feared; the farmer will have got a market at his own door for the produce of his land; the manufacturer will find a lively home demand from the farmer for the products of his machines.

All this, good people, can be achieved by your own votes at your own firesides, without the aid of Congress or the Legislature—it is simply to vote that your insurance shall go to the BUILDERS', by which vote you shall enable us to plant factories all over the country. You shall fill the rivers and harbors with busy ships; you shall send out upon the distant waves fishing expeditions that will bring back wealth to your cities: you shall form a nursery of seamen around your own shores—the ova of a future commerce and a protective navy; you will create the hum of busy workmen in every desirable locality on the Pacific coast; you will bring from neglected fields produce of the utmost value; all of which will most certainly multiply a thousand fold the wealth of the country in which your lot is cast, making a worthy home for yourselves and a future country for your offspring.

People of the Pacific States and Territories! We pledge ourselves to you to effect, with your co-operation, some of those things. We have kept all our pledges so far, and have uttered nothing that was not true. Already have we helped to move the shuttle and the loom, which others, with more means, have passed by and neglected. Already have we helped to build and rig ships in our own dock-yards, and sent them over the wide waves in search of riches for the city. Already have we given many liberal bounties and donations to the deserving institutions of the city. Give your vote to the BUILDERS', and we shall share its profits with every useful charity and every honest industry, and help along every enterprise that promises benefit to the people.

We call for the yeas and nays.

THE DEW OF EDEN.

LADIES OF CALIFORNIA?—If you will keep your complexions in the freshness, delicacy and beauty of youth, you must use the DEW OF EDEN, for it is the only article extant that will do for those using it all that it purports without injury, as it contains no mineral or poisonous substances whatever. It preserves the skin from the effects of climate and atmospheric changes; prevents the formation of Freckles, Tan, Morphew, Sunburn and Wrinkles. It keeps the skin soft, tender and beautiful; because it is congenial and natural to it, and composed of ingredients that supply to it what time and exposure take too rapidly away. It preserves and restores. It is valuable to the young, but more so to those from whom the stern hand of Time is stealing the treasures of youth; to such, it will actually arrest its depredations and avert its ravages upon the human face divine. It will surely smooth out those lines of care to a great extent, and restore the skin to comparative youth. Used on the hands daily, it preserves them in all fineness of texture and delicacy of early years. It gives a beautiful tint to the nails of the fingers, and keeps them tender and soft. It is not a cosmetic, and must not be used with any kind of paint. A simple powder, however, of harmless nature, may be used without detriment with this protective.

No lady once using the DEW OF EDEN will ever afterward dispense with it from her toilet.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

A Non Sequitur.

Under the heading of "A Good Democrat," the local editor of the Times tells a story of a Democrat residing near Telegraph Hill, who cut down a rose tree when told that it was a variety named "President Lincoln." He winds up as follows:

"This man was a Democrat, and according to the lights of his party, should be accounted a staunch and true one. He is also a specimen Democrat, and therefore we introduce him to our readers. He is evidently no believer in Shakspeare, (probably never having heard of that writer,) and does not think that

'A rose by any other name would smell as sweet.'"

We cannot own the inference drawn a just one. This Democrat does not think that "a rose by any other name would smell as sweet," but a precious deal sweeter.

A Pardonable Error.

J. H. Vinson, the stage manager of the Metropolitan Theatre, has been indefatigable in his efforts to acquire a knowledge of the Japanese language. He very soon learned to say "good night" in Japanese, and then requested the interpreter to teach him to say "good morning" in the same charming language. He was informed that O-hi-o was the Japanese for "good morning," and on the following day, when the Japanese came down to the theatre, Mr. Vinson commenced to display his newly-acquired knowledge. As each one of them came on the stage, he said in the most affable manner, "Kentucky;" they did not seem to understand him, and he complained to the interpreter that he had not given him the right word. On being told that he had made a mistake, that O-hi-o was the word instead of Kentucky, he said: "Yes; so it is. But I wasn't far off, I got the next State to Ohio."

The Highly-flavored "Alta."

No one can complain that the Alta is slow at present, or that it does not gratify the public taste for spicy and highly-flavored items of news. The headings of the news paragraphs in yesterday's issue were alone worth the price of the paper. "ATROCIOUS MUTILATION—A YOUNG GIRL OF EIGHT YEARS OF AGE LITTERALLY CHOPPED INTO CHUNKS, AND THE PIECES SCATTERED BROADCAST," is one of the most startling. No one but a gentleman lately arrived from Paris could have written that. "Chopped into chunks" is sublime. The expression, "a young girl of eight years of age" is good, no one but a careful and experienced writer would have been thus careful to prevent the public from falling into the error of supposing that it was an old girl of eight years of age, who was "chopped into chunks." We then have a thrilling description of the manner in which three men were blown to pieces and two others shockingly wounded, a most inspiriting account of the butchery of Lieutenants Murdaugh and Borchet, and the mutilation of their bodies, and other paragraphs equally spicy. The police reports are once more written in the well-known facetious style of that inimitable humorist, Fitz Smythe—the literary Emperor Norton of San Francisco—thus:—

"Raphael Levy, for snatching Lazarus Moses, alias Fagin, baldheaded, (literally,) and then poulticing the bare spot with one of Cadue's best Folsom paving cobbles, was fined $10, with the alternative of going to jail for twenty days.

"Robert Armstrong, for an assault and battery on John Tuck, was fined $25, and John Tuck, for tucking his tongue out at Robert Armstrong, and "calling him out of his name," was ordered to appear for sentence."

And altogether the Alta is becoming one of the most sprightly papers in the United States.

The Best Country Newspaper in the State.

A half interest in "the best country newspaper in the State" is advertised for sale in the Call, price $2,000. Surely this cannot be the Sacramento Union. We consider the Union "the best country paper in the State," but a half interest would be very cheap at $2,000.

Emigration of Dogs.

Many a well-bred, amiable and gentlemanly dog has been slaughtered in this city by the dog-butcher of the Pound and his assistant assassins. Luckily for the dogs there are places in this State where their value is appreciated. In Humboldt county a petition, praying for the repeal of a law passed at the last session of the Legislature, imposing a tax on dogs, is in circulation. The Humboldt people appreciate dogs. Since this fact has become generally known among the dogs of San Francisco, many have emigrated from this city. Every day two or three canine stow-aways are found on board the Sacramento boat. These energetic animals are anxious to get to Sacramento, and intend to walk from thence into Humboldt county, where they will be respected, and can earn their own living by taking care of stock. If some of the lazy bipeds who prowl round this city, and who deserve to be pounded far more than do the good dogs, would also emigrate to the agricultural and stock raising districts, it would be a great blessing.

Lively and Enlightened Santa Cruz.

On Sunday last, Santa Cruz, as we learn from the Sentinel, "had a lively little earthquake of half a minute's duration, which made the crockery rattle and started people out to see the sky fall." On the following evening Santa Cruz was, for the first time, illuminated with gas. A city which has a larger-sized earthquake than has been experienced in San Francisco for eighteen months on Sunday, and is lighted by gas on Mondy, may claim to be "some pumpkins," or as the Sentinel expresses it:

"This event may be considered important, as it is the point from which a village starts to put on city airs, usages and customs."

A Working-Man's Paper.

The Evening Dispatch, which aims to be considered especially the organ of the poor and laboring, as opposed to the wealthy and speculating classes, in its issue of yesterday, called for the passage of a more stringent game law. It objects to quail being netted and trapped and thus sent to market at a reasonable price and in large quantities. It talks in the most aristocratic style of "the healthy sports of the field," etc. Why should not the poverty stricken working-man of California enjoy occasionally a cheap quail, although after his toil of eight hours per diem, throughout the week, renders him too fatigued to participate in "the healthy sports of the field." Are quail to be protected from traps and nets for the purpose of affording the comparitively sm all number of city sportsmen who can afford to get guns, powder and shot, an opportunity of slaughtering them. No aristocratic game laws for California! Let the people catch the quail by nets, traps, or any other means, that quail may be cheap.

Horrid Depravity.

The News Letter, which has long enjoyed an amiable reputation in this community, a conservator of public morals, patriotism and piety, was much shocked by the prize fight between "two young ladies" which took place at the Olympic Theatre on the occasion of J. Stackhouse's benefit one evening last week. It says:

"Prize fighting is a gross and brutal exhibition when two men beat each other out of the likeness of pigs into that of raw beef, and all for money. This is rank and smells to Heaven. But when two "young ladies" come forward at a theater in San Francisco, and begin to maul each other's lovely mugs, and all for love, what shall we say? These modern martyrs of a grand idea take too much to heart the reported physical degeneracy of their sex in America. It is pathetic to think of Molly's gentle first tapping the claret from Kate's aspiring nose; pathetic to picture the drunken rainbow hues that will invest Molly's left peeper, when Kate has plauted her manly; but sadder far this, than these, than all, is the thought of the emotions that must stir the breast of Tommy, the trainer, the guide, philosopher, and friend of both. We cannot endure the contemplation of so much noble nature, nobly striving with the right—and left. We take leave of the beautiful trio with the reflection, that any importation of Japanese beastliness is superfluous, so long as we can furnish native brutes like these."

We only regret that the News Letter, perhaps, from a mistaken idea of delicacy and regard for the feelings of their parents, did not publish the names of the "young ladies" who made such "native brutes" of themselves. No such feeling can deter us. The "young ladies" were named respectively Lew Rattler and Johnny De Angelis.

Japanese Music.

In our last roar from the Lion's Mouth, we expressed our indignation at the lack of appreciation of the beauties of Japanese music, evinced by the public of San Francisco, and the jealousy displayed by musical artists. We are happy to state that a change has taken place. Ha'yah-takee's performance on a Japanese violin converted even the leader of the opposition orchestra. If the people of San Francisco were to listen to a concert of Japanese music every night for the space of eighteen months, they would appreciate it but at present, though understood and admired by all thorough musical critics, it is caviare to the general.

Shockingly Indelicate.

The Banner of Progres, which is at present edited by the gifted M., the intellectual T. being at present engaged in spiritualizing the denizens of Jackass Gulch or Red Dog Cañon, we forget which, contains a "pome" with this heading: [For the Banner of Progress,] "Lines Composed at the Funeral of a Friend." J. T. Rouse wrote these lines. We should feel comforted on our death-bed—as the last expiration left our pallid lips, if we were only assured that J. T. Rouse would write lines at our funeral. It is enough to tempt a man to become a subject for a funeral to know that he leaves a friend behind him who will not waste the time he spends at his funeral in vain regrets, but will take out of his pocket the blank leaf of a letter and begin to compose lines "for the Banner of Progress." TREM.

MY MEXICAN MINES.

SOME four or five years ago I went to California. Why I went there I have not yet been able to determine. There was no necessity in the case—certainly nothing in the world is easier than not to go to California. But I went. Just six weeks after going out from Hell Gate the Golden Gate swung to behind me, on hypothetical hinges. The great city of San Francisco loomed up before me in all its fragrance and freshness. Of all the happy moments experienced in a somewhat checkered career, two are so particularly memorable that they can never be forgotten: one is when, after that terrible sea-voyage with its dirt and discomfort, I landed in San Francisco—the other when I left it. Do not imagine that in this statement I intend to bring discredit or contempt upon the Queen City of the Pacific Coast—that Mecca which all pilgrims praise, but where few take up permanent residences. Rather let the confession turn to my own disadvantage; set it down to the peculiarity of a roving and restless temper, which could scarcely be happy and contented in Paradise—at least in such a Paradise as is commonly painted for the edification of the popular mind.

At the time of my arrival in San Francisco the mining excitement was at its height. Joint stock companies under every conceivable name for "developing" mines in the most extraordinary localities were every day organized, the list of the incorporations regularly filling a column in the morning papers. Nearly the whole coast was staked out into claims. People bought anything and everything that was offered as "feet." The man who blundered over a boulder fell into fortune, for he could come into town, report that he had found a lead "as good as the Gould and Curry," and sell out at any price he pleased. (Gould and Curry, a mine situated on the famous Comstock Ledge, selling at $5,000 a foot and paying a dividend of $150 a month, was the favorite standard of comparison.) Tunnels were run through granite mountains, shafts were sunk nearly to the center of gravity, until square miles of ground looked as though it had been bored over by gigantic gophers. Especially was this the case in Nevada, through which State one cannot travel even at this time without incurring the risk of falling into pit-holes from which there could be no resurrection. Those were flush times indeed. A company called "The Lone Mountain Gold and Silver Mining Company" was organized for the purpose of working a fancied vein in that silent cemetery. Fortunately it gave out at an early period, or the poor pioneers who for uneventful years had slumbered beneath the clover and daisies would have been turned out from what they had considered their last resting-place, to take compulsory glimpses of the moon. Tunneling the tomb of an ancester in search of the precious metals may seem too outrageous for belief: but I solemnly assure the reader that the company above mentioned was actually incorporated and that the ground was broken. Yea, I will even own that I had stock in it myself. There were no bounds to the excitement and enterprise of the frenzied treasure-seekers, and when it is considered how many holes can be dug in the earth's surface without finding gold, one ceases to wonder at the many failures which followed.

But the great States and Territories of California, Nevada, Oregon, Arizona, Idaho, and Montana did not afford a field wide enough for mining ambition. Mexico stretched out her golden arms. Mines that had yielded millions of dollars under the crude manipulations of native hands were to be had for mere songs—for the promise of a song. Mines that were opened, mines that stood ready to be rifled, like the legendary pigs that in the good old days ran about the streets of London ready roasted and clamoring to be eaten. Did you doubt the stories! Lo, were not the pages of Ward's History of Mexico unfolded to your gaze! Was it not there put down, in the plainest black and white, how the San This and the Santa That had turned out treasure faster than all the mules that the country contained could pack away? These mines, abandoned by their improvident owners, only needed the open sesame of capital at their doors to again unlock their riches. If they yielded so enormously by the imperfect native method of treating ores, what will they not yield under the improved system which American skill and capital can command, cried the sanguine soul of the speculator?

Wood, water and labor—the great requisites in a mining country—were plenty and cheap. The mining laws were in favor of the worker. What wonder then that there was a rush for Mexican investments! Those who had made money at home sought to double it abroad; those who had lost expected to make up their losses and more in this new field of enterprise. My seat was among the latter. Reaching California when speculation was at full tide, I was just in time to launch my little boat on the top wave, and get the full benefit of the ebb. A friend gave me "points;" he had the "inside track," he said. And he had as I found to my cost, quite the "insido track" of me. The stock which he kindly sold me, with the assurance that its certain appreciation would enable us to visit Europe together, fell on my hands to a merely nominal figure; my name appeared on the delinquent list at the Broker's Board about the same time that his was registered in Paris.

EL TIGRE COLORADO.

But I was not bereft of friends by my misfortune; I found scores of friends—sympathizing friends. One, in particular, expressed a great desire to see me get even. The way that he proposed to get me "even" was decidedly odd—though, after all, but an application of the hair-of-the-dog-that-bit-you principle. A benevolent old Spaniard with one eye was in town to dispose of a mine which he owned in Durango. There were 1,800 feet in the mine (putting my foot in made it 1,801;) he wouldn't sell the whole of it, not even to his best friends—he couldn't, he said, in justice to his family. But would he sell half at $100 a foot, for the sake of raising the money to purchase and erect the needful machinery. The mine was called El Tigre Colorado—Spanish for "The Red Tiger." He had a drawing or plan of the mine with him, beautifully executed and highly colored—the reason, perhaps, that it was called Colorado. There were galleries and chambers and columns and pillars without end; it all looked not unlike a five-story hotel. The columns and pillars, he explained, had been left there in accordance with a law of the country, which insisted upon that solid support. Even if the rest of the mine "petered out," those pillars—nearly pure silver—could be taken out, and made to yield millions! The course of the vein—he called it veta—was marked and accompanied with marginal notes. Here it was only four feet wide; there it branched out to twenty; here it would not yield more than two or three hundred dollars a ton; there, where the veta was widest, as many thousand. It was easy enough to calculate the profit to accrue from first workings. The mill which it was proposed to erect would crush and work thirty tons of ore a day; but suppose it only worked twenty. The ore would easily average $1,000 a ton; but suppose it only yielded $500. Twenty times $500 was $10,000. Allow $250 for expense of working—there you had a clear profit of $9,750 a day. Counting twenty-six working days to a month, and you had $253,500, which gave a dividend of about $140 a month to the share. Or suppose it were only $100—the fortunate possessor of twenty shares would even then have an income in gold of $24,000 per annum. Was that to be sneezed at? And the investment was so small! Who could resist the temptation? I, for one, could not; a present Judge of the Supreme Court of the United States could not; any number of widows and orphans and young men ambitious of matrimony could not—my friend who endorsed the character of his friend, the benevolent old Spaniard with one eye (and not without consideration, as we afterward ascertained,) was persuaded to use his influence to procure us stock: we "went in" with avidity. Fortunately the fool-killer did not come round about that time, or I should not be here to tell the tale of how we came out.

Well, machinery was bought and shipped and the old Don went down to superintend things. This was July. He assured us that about Christmas we might look for returns. And we did look for them—but I anticipate. The machinery went with him, and both were safely landed at Mazatlan.

Every steamer thereafter brought us most excellent news. The machinery was almost at the mine; and at the mine everything was prepared for the reception—the beds were placed for the batteries, the engine-house was nearly completed, and the gist of all was that we might expect dividends about Thanksgiving time instead of Christmas. The mine looked better and better every day, he said; he had got the old works connected with the new—we would see what he meant by reference to the map of the mine which he had left with us—and the result surpassed his most sanguine expectations. He had laid bare a stretch of metal 600 feet in length and 6 feet wide, which assayed some $2,500 a ton, and would not work less than $2,000; and with a fine burst of that poetry for which the mellifluous lingua Hispaniola is noted, he wound up by saying, "Compose yourselves, my children, and prepare to be astonished. I will send you some specimens that will cause you to open your eyes wide as your beautiful plaza." Consequently we were jubilant, and paid the little assessment of $20 a share, which it was found necessary to levy, without a murmur; and so the months wore on. Christmas came and went. The news was always excellent, but that was all. Once the Don sent us a drawing of the mill and works as they would appear when completed, with the American flag flying from the roof, and the smoke of the furnaces rolling to the skies in great volumes; but there the news ended. We could not exactly understand how, with the machinery so near the mill all the while, we never received intelligence of its actual arrival; nor why a little detail of facts was not indulged in instead of these glittering generalities; and an assessment of $30 a share coming pat on the last assurance that we all might consider ourselves millionaires, made some of us look grave, and set the older ones thinking. The result was that a purse was made up, and one of the stockholders appointed to go down and look into things. With admirable judgment the gentleman—my friend—who sold us the stock and acted as a sort of factotum for the old Don was selected for the mission. By return steamer we heard from him. Everything was lovely, and all that we had to do was to possess our souls in patience, pay our assessments regularly, and our fortunes were made; and the next steamer brought up the gentleman himself. When questioned closely there was a vagueness about his answers which suggested a suspicion, and another meeting of stockholders was called. It was then ascertained that our embassador, discovering that the mine was some three hundred miles in the interior, and only to be reached by muleback, never stirred out of Mazatlan, contenting himself with sending us the statements transmitted to him by the old Don, from whom he received another gift of shares in the Red Tigre of Durango. His reports turned out to be nothing but echoes!

So we dispatched another envoy—a practical, hard-pated, thorough-going old Englishman, familiarly known as "The Baron." For three months we heard nothing at all from him. At the end of that time the Baron landed from the steamer, and the cause of his silence was soon explained. On arriving at Mazatlan he found that not a pound of the machinery had ever left that port for the interior. The Don had mortgaged it for all it was worth, and there it lay, subject to the order of a private money-lender. On inquiring the way to our mine, the famous Tigre Colorado, the citizens of Mazatlan stared at him in surprise; they had never before heard the name! So he purchased a mule and saddle and pushed for the interior, where he hoped to find the population better posted. After many hardships and much soreness of flesh he succeeded in reaching Tamisula, a town which we had been told was five leagues distant from our mining property. Here he inquired if any one in those parts knew anything about El Tigre Colorado. "Si, Señor," cried one of the natives, clapping his hands; and, turning to a crowd of by-standers, he explained with a caramba or two that here was one of those fools of Americans come down to look for the mine sold them by Don Enrique. Volunteering his services as guide, this same native set off with the Baron. The Tigre Colorado proved to be located on the top of an inaccessible mountain—I forget how many feet above the level of the sea—where it defied both mule and man. As near as I could make out from the Baron's report, the facts of the case were about as follows: In the first place, it was impossible to get to where the mine was said to be. In the second place, if one could have got there he'd have found no mine. In the third place, could one have got there, and had he found a mine, it would not have been worth the working. Never was there a more complete swindle.

Retracing his steps, our Baron set out in search of Don Enrique. At last he found him on a plantation which he had purchased, incurring debts in the Company's name and selling off the produce in his own. What was raised on the place I do not now remember, and do not know that I ever knew, but whatever it was the crop was all disposed of long before the Baron arrived. But not so the debts. The Don had paid nothing to his hands, and they were on the eve of an outbreak. In a brief speech to the excited mountaineers, the Don introduced the Baron to them as a plenipotentiary who had come to pay off the outstanding debts of the Great American Company. The consequence was that the unsuspicions and unwitting Baron alighted from his mule in the midst of some hundreds of peons, all clamoring for money. He not understanding a word of Spanish, and they not speaking a word of English, it was some time before one party to the discussion knew what the other was at. That point once explained, however, the "plenipoteutiary" very concisely and clearly stated to them that he came after money, not to pay money; that he had nothing but bread and cheese in his capacious wallet. On this, off they rushed to Don Enrique, howling like a pack of wolves. He counseled them not to believe a word of what the American said; that was the way these sharp, shrewd traders always talked; they must persist in their demands, and not be put off by empty words. So they returned to the charge. The poor man reiterated his assertions, and endeavored to explain the matter. As well might he have talked to the winds. Satisfied that he was endeavoring to cheat them out of their just dues, and in reality had stores of gold and silver in his saddle-bags that was of right theirs, they set upon him in wild fury, and would have beaten him to death had it not been for the opportune arrival of a file of soldiers. As it was they pounded him so severely that he was confined to his bed for a month, and landed in San Francisco with his eyes still poulticed and the sense of hearing in one ear totally destroyed.

A few of the Company were not yet satisfied, and made me liberal offers if I would undertake a Mexican mission for the representation of our common interests; but not having a head for skillful financiering, still less a head for the pouching that the Baron's experience so plainly prognosticated, I declined the appointment with thanks; and that was the last of El Tigre Colorado.

THE HUMBUGGIO MINING COMPANY.

But it was not the last of my Mexican ventures. Throughout the whole of the affair above narrated it will be seen that we plainly invited our fate. Buying a mine that not a soul of us ever saw, on the representation of a stranger whom none of us knew save by the indorsement of one with whom we were almost equally unacquainted, and shipping machinery in the dark—was ever there seen such folly? But here came an opportunity to retrieve my fortunes and avail myself of the experience gained at such cost—picking my path through the future by the aid of the stern-lights of the past. A brawny ex captain of the British army, who had long been sojourning in Guaymas as British Consul or something else that carried with it buttons and consideration, came to San Francisco with his pockets full of maps and papers pertaining to two noted mines—mines that had a history, that were mentioned in Ward's Mexico, that were famous in the annals of the country. Moreover, he bore with him letters of introduction from Mexican magnates to San Francisco financiers—careful, prudent men, whose lead the multitude deem it safe to follow in all cases. There was no chicanery about this concern—here I speak by the card—for the organizers and officers of the company were and are among the best and dearest friends. We all went in together—and I considered myself extremely fortunate to get in. This was a very different affair from the Red Tiger. Here we knew what we were about; had documentary evidence to begin on, and no lack of capital to go ahead with. One of the best theoretical and practical miners on the coast—a graduate of the famous Gould and Curry—was selected for superintendent. He took stock. Engineer, blacksmiths, carpenters, firemen—all were Americans and practical miners; and all of them took stock. There was no one connected with the Company in any capacity whatever who did not manifest confidence by putting capital—the last test. The machinery which we purchased was one of the most expensive and improved kind; nothing was left undone or unbought that could in any way contribute to that success which none doubted. Stores for the men, garden seeds, soap, sugar, calomel, raisins, pepper, canned fruits, pickled lobsters and oysters—all the necessaries of life and many of the luxuries of the season were shipped in profusion—a year's supply. We watched our argosy go out with triumphant hearts, and our eyes might have been taken for diamond editions of the Pleasures of Hope.

That the reader may not think that we built entirely without foundation I append the prospectus, cut with some remorse at the sacrifice from the little pamphlet once so dear to me, and which I have long preserved as carefully as one does a memento of a girl who has jilted him, a token exchanged when all was love and confidence. I only change the names slightly:

PROSPECTUS OF THE HUMBUGGIO MINING COMPANY.—Capital Stock, $206,700. Four Thousand One Hundred and Thirty four Shares, each Share representing one Spanish foot, at $50—$206,700.

The property consists of eight hundred varas of the Mine called "Nuestra Señora del Humbuggio," and five hundred and seventy-eight varas of the Mine called "La Motherinluwo;" altogether one thousand three hundred and seventy eight varas, or four thousand one hundred and thirty four Spanish feet. Twenty-eight hundred are offered for sale at $50—$140,000; the remaining one thousand three hundred and thirty-four feet are reserved by the proprietors.

Will be paid for the two Mines, in cash, the sum of	$ 50,000
For the erection of Reduction of Works and for working capital will be required the amply sufficient sum of	62,000
Leaving a reserve fund of	28,000
Total	$140,000

The sum set down for Reduction Works and Working Capital includes every thing required for the successful working of the Mines, so that Shareholders will only have to pay $10 per foot.

The sum of $15 upon each foot, or share, will be paid on subscription, and the balance will be called in by the Directors of the Company in installments when needed.

The sum of $32,000 will be paid for the Mines on delivery of the title-deeds, and the balance of $18,000 will be gradually paid, according to the assessments made. The ores are argentiferous, charged with gold; are docile in their reduction, and will average at least one hundred and twenty-five dollars per ton; the expenses of their extraction and reduction by the barrel process may be estimated at about $25 per ton.

At a distance of one mile and a half from the Mines there is a suitable place for the establishment of Reduction Works, dwellings, etc., never-failing and healthy water being supplied by a creek, while timber, fuel, and pasturage are in abundance close by. A wagon road may be made from the Mines to the Reduction Works at an outlay of a few hundred dollars.

A steam-engine of sufficient force, and a twenty-stamp battery, with the corresponding number of barrels, will be required for the reduction of twenty tons of ore daily. This amount of ore can be extracted from the Mines at present, but may be greatly augmented in a few months, when the present workings have been expended. During the erection of the machinery the Company intend to reduce the ores in the Mexican patio process, so that the proceeds of the Mines will pay at once a profit of $150 to $200 a day.

The Mines of the Company are situated in the celebrated Jesus Maria, in the Sierra Madre, or Mother Mountains, in the State of Chihuahua, Mexico, close to the boundary line of Sonora, at a distance of two hundred and fifty miles from the ports of Guaymas and Agiabampo, on the Gulf of California. There is a wagon road for about two-thirds of the distance; a couple of hundred pack-mules can be had at a few days' notice, and the entire freight from San Francisco to the Company's Mines will not exceed $100 per ton.

The climate of this part of the Sierra Madre is delightful and healthy; provisions are low, and labor is abundant and cheap.

The above Mines hold out a most profitable investment in the Sierra Madre, which is generally admitted to contain the richest Mines of the Mexican Republic.

Do any wonder that with such a prospectus, which in every word and syllable stood to us as does the Koran to the Faithful, we were jubilant and exultant? The stock had then cost the original subscribers $25 a share. A little changed hands at $100—very little, however, for few would sell at any price. And this firm and favorable feeling was immensely streugthened by the first letter of the superintendent, who wrote that he found the mine better in all respects and more promising than had been represented; that it was better than Gould and Curry—and he being an old employee of the latter Company, it seemed likely that he should know. For my one hundred shares I was offered one hundred dollars each in gold—$10,000 in all. It had cost me but $2,500. The temptation was stroug to sell, but who likes to fling fortune away? However, I wrote to the resident Guaymas correspondent of a newspaper with which I was connected, who I knew had just returned from a tour of inspection to the mines of Chihuahua, telling him my offer, and asking his advice. He most emphatically and decidedly advised and exhorted me not to sell. Such a mine he had never seen; Golconda paled its ineffectual ores in comparison. And the surroundings; the wood, the water, the climate! Well, I refused the offer, and held on.

Our Secretary went down there and spent two or three months, returning in a great state of excitation, with his pockets literally "full of rocks," as specimens. He had seen the wealth of our possessions with his own eyes; there could be no doubt about it; and he bonght stock right and left of all who could be persuaded to part with any.

By-and-by came news that the mill was up and ready to run. But unfortunately it was the dry season, and the mill could not run without water. Anon came the rainy season, and then the mine could not be worked because the shafts were full. It struck me that if the mill could not be run at one season for want of water, and the mine could not be worked at another because of it, returns might be rather indefinitely postponed. But this little objection was explained away; a hydraulic ram would moisten the mill. and a tunnel would drain the mine. And again all went merry as marriage bells.

We received regular letters, and not an unfavorable one among them all. One steamer brought a letter, but not the usual accompanying report. This, however, was susceptible of explanation by the complaint that they were out of gunpowder. How could they make a report without it? A barrel or two was shipped, and reports were at once resumed.

At last came one which startled every stockholder into ecstacies. Three hundred and fifty tons of ore, averaging $125 to the ton, were ready for the mill. The next day the batteries were to commence their poundings and the quicksilver its subtle work of amalgamation. "Look for a shipment of $25, 000 or $30, 000 by the next steamer!" wrote the superintendent.

I was offered $150 a share for my stock—but no. This was my opportunity, and I was resolved not to lose it. Bets were offered that the shares would go to $500 in six months; to $1.000 within the year; that a dividend of five dollars a share would be declared within sixty days. Who would be such a fool as to sell under such circumstances?

I was such a fool as not to!

In due time came the steamer—bringing intelligence that the three hundred tons of ore worked did not pay expenses, owing to some difficulty in its proper treatment, and that we must not expect a shipment for some little time. Then I was perfectly willing to sell, but the buyer was not to be found.

Still, we were not disheartened; assessments were levied, but all paid them cheerfully—for we had confidence in the mine. And this confidence seemingly brought its reward when we soon got a hurrah letter—a regular Fourth of July sort of a document—from the superintendent. "I have the pleasure of informing the Humbuggio Company," he began, "that the mine is bonanza. ("Bonanza" really means smooth sailing, a fair breeze, etc.; but is used by the Mexican miners to express very rich ores, or "shoots." Specimens of the bonanza accompanied the letter—lumps of soft, blue-looking rock, not much harder than clay, all spangled with beads and threads of pure silver. Unfortunately, however, it seemed that just as the shaft was well timbered up for extraction of ore in large quantities, the water rushed in from some old works and drove the miners out. So another delay was indicated.

And so the thing went on for a year and more—hope and disappointment alternating, yet a secret trust underlying the stratum of despair, which moved us all to pay the regular assessments with tolerable composure.

Once embarked in an enterprise of this kind, our position is somewhat like that of an eel in a mud-pipe—there is no backing out, and the only way is to wriggle on in the hope of getting out at the opposite and larger end. Justice compels me to say that assessments could have been levied with no greater regularity by any set of Directors than they was by ours. As regularly as the month came round the stereotyped advertisement appeared in the proper newspapers that, at a meeting of the Directors of the Humbuggio Gold and Silver Mining Company, an assessment of $2 50 a share had been levied upon each and every share of the capital stock of the Company, and that all shares on which the assessment was not paid before a certein date would be advertised for sale at a given time in accordance with the by-laws of the Company. Two hundred and fifty dollars in gold is not to be picked up each month of the year in every bush. For the first time in my career I found that I had a definite aim in life—to clear up assessments as fast as they became due. It was nip and tuck with me between holding on to my stock and being sold out; but by great industry and prudence I managed to keep a little ahead and my mouth above water. Not so the mine; it was flooded the greater part of the time; but a tunnel which was being driven through an interminable mountain would effect the work of drainage—when completed. The mountain being of a peculiarly adamantine construction progress was only made at the rate of about six inches per diem; but, as there were only four or five hundred feet to be tunneled, that didn't matter much. It was simply a matter of time.

In the meanwhile dissatisfaction was felt with the superintendent. and his removal was decided upon. The fault, it was claimed, was all his. Comparing the sanguineness and universal approbation with which his administration was accepted with the result, it sometimes occurred to me that the fault perhaps lay in the mine. But no—several of the stockholders, practical miners, who had examined the mine, and were familiar with its every inch, were confident of its value, and that only gross mismanagement could have thus far prevented returns. So another superintendent, an original subscriber to the stock, and a man of extensive experience in various mines and mills all the world over, was appointed and sent down. He, too, was highly elated on arriving at the scene of action. Of course he found fault with every thing that the former superintendent had done, and remodeled and reorganized all the workings. More, he wrote up offering to take all the stock that was offered for sale, and urging and imploring all his friends to buy in.

Just as the new superintendent got fairly in the saddle, the resident Director at Guaymas, an original projector, the ex-Captain, died. At a meeting which was held in consequence one of our Directors piously spoke of the untowardness of the poor Captain's being taken away just as everything looked so bright, lamenting the he could not have been spared to witness the successful fruition of the great enterprise. To my mind it seemed that the regret was equivaleut to an aspiration for the immortality of the deceased party; but still I hoped.

Under the new management Humbuggio stock looked up—being flat on its back it could not well look any other way—and I had an offer for mine which would have let me out a little ahead. The temptation to take it was sore upon me. For I began to say to myself that the established fact upon which we all had been accustomed to build so confidently, that the mine had yielded immense sums of bullion, was rather an argument against its promise than otherwise. It proved that the natives knew something about mining, and the inference was, that they would not have abandoned work had they not found that it could not be coutinued with profit. It occurred to me that if they could not make the mine pay, and our first superintendent with his eminent character and Gould and Curry experience could get nothing out of it, the chances were that the mine was indeed impracticable if not valueless, and had been abandoned for that very reason. And one morning I started out, strong in my common sense deductions, to to find a purchaser. "What, sell now!" cried a friend whom I met and conferred with, "after holding on so long; absurd!" I gave him my reasons. He explained them all away. The upshot of it was, that when the man who had made the offer for my stock called on me to learn the decision I refused. For the second or third time during my Humbuggio probation two fools met.

But why prolong the details when the reader must have already anticipated the denouement. The second superintendent was found fault with and dismissed, and a new one appointed. My good friend the Secretary, after a severe fit of sickness, brought on not so much by his own disappointment as by the fact that he had innocently been the means to incur losses which they could ill afford, took the steamer for Guaymas and a mule for the interior, affirming his determination never to return until the enterprise was successful.

"Then good-by forever, old fellow!" I said, as I shook hands with him on the wharf.

The mine was then deeply in debt, and the rainy season was at its height. But, rain or shine, the assessments went on with unvarying regularity. These I paid with a Christian composure, hoping against hope, and loth to sacrifice what had cost me so much for so little, until one fatal day the end came. The good Bank of California, which had stood my faithful friend through thick and thin, refused to make any further advances. The wonder to me was that they had not nipped me in the bud long before, for the stock was, and had for some time been, hypothecated to them for twice what it was worth. But all bankers are not blood-thirsty, and occasionally you meet one like Ralston, who consents of his own accord to temper the wind to the shorn sheep. Turning my stock over to his bank—the only institution I knew of that was able to carry it any longer—I fled the country and reached this glad haven, where assessments cease from troubling and the speculator who repents of his stupidity is comparatively at rest.

I have not heard from the Humbuggio directly since leaving San Francisco. Once a man, who said he came directly from the mine, called upon me to give the latest news from there; but I sent out a servent for a policeman immediately he made his errand known. In an accidental and indirect way I have heard that they "struck a horse" soon after my leaving, and that the mill has since been running on custom-work. I expect to yet hear that, diverted from the glorious purposes for which it was originally intended, it is grinding mule-feed for the rude branches of the primeval people who inhabit that damnable country where Juarez and Maximilian have held alternate sway.

"We have not abandoned the enterprise," wrote a friend from there some time since; "we are simply lying on our oars." Lying on and about their ores is the only thing the wretched owners of those worthless mining properties have been known to do since a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary.

In conclusion I have very little to say. I have merely given my experience, and the reader can draw his own deductions. Far be it from me to discourage mining enterprises. Many have proved successful beyond the wildest dreams of their originators. I simply wish to warn the multitude of their uncertainty in general, and disabuse them of the idea that mines which will turn out millions of dollars a year are often sold for a few thousand in cash. So far as the uncertainty of the thing is concerned, what can be more instructive and suggestive than to know that in the matter of this Humbuggio the best experts, men of the oldest experience, were deceived? Of all our three superintendents there was not one who did not in his very soul believe that the Humbuggio was richer and more valuable than any mine the famous Comstock Ledge of Nevada coutained, and would make larger returns, investing their own money and persuading and beseeching all their friends to do the same. Of all the hundred reports that came from the mine, from travelers, prospectors, and men who had not a dollar's interest in the affair, not one spoke in its disfavor—all were agreed as to the great value of the mine. Yet it never yielded a dollar, and in all probability never will until the red locks of Mars have grown gray. Lay your money down on the green cloth and you know precisely what you are to lose. Stake it on a mining venture and you are entirely at sea in that particular. For it is not only the first step there that costs. The sly sapping of the inevitable assessments is as insidious but as sure as the encroachments of rust or the wearing of rock by a constant dropping of water. My little investment in the Humbuggio cost first and last just $10,000 in gold—more money than ever I expect to see again in the whole course of my natural life. From the periling of such an amount at one dash I would of course have shrunk with horror; but it was taken by installments. It is almost incredible how speedily one's life-blood can drain out in a tiny trickling. My other little mining adventures in dear delightful El Dorado cost me about $5,000 more in gold. And the first dollar I have ever received from any connection I have ever had with mines comes from this article narrating my experience. Not only is it the first, bnt also, in all human probability, the last.—Harper's Magazine.

We Fade as a Leaf.—As the trials of life thicken and the dreams of other days fade, one by one, in the deep vista of disappointed hope, the heart grows weary of the struggle and we begin to realize our insignificance. Those who have climbed to the pinnacle of fame, or revel in luxury and wealth, go to the grave at last with the poor mendicant who begs pennies by the wayside, and like him are soon forgotten. Generation after generation. says an eloqnent modern writer, have felt as we feel, and their fellows were as active in life as ours are now. They passed away as a vapor, while nature wore the same aspect of beauty as when her Creator commanded her to be. And so likewise shall it be when we are gone. The heavens will be as bright over our grave as they are now around our path; the world will have the same attraction for offspring yet unborn that she has had once for ourselves, and that she has now for our children. Yet a little while, and all this will have happened! Days will continue to move on, and laughter and song will be heard in the very chamber in which we died; and the eye that mourned for us will be dried and will glisten with joy; and even our children will cease to think of us, will not remember to lisp our name,

"BLACKWOOD" ON THE PROSPECTS OF AMERICAN REPUDIATION.

The July number of Blackwood's Magazine contains a peculiarly bitter article on "The American Debt and the Financial Prospects of the Union," in which our affairs are presented in the most gloomy aspect. The country has been ruined by the war, the debt is much larger than has been represented, and the chance is that it will never be paid. On the subject of repudiation, the writer says:

"When the war was brought to so unexpected a conclusion in April, 1865, the North was as much surprised as it was delighted; yet it labored under the fear that if the Union was to be restored in fact as well as in theory, and more especially if the Southern States were to be treated as Mr. Johnson and others declared they ought to be treated—viz: as if they had never been out of the Union—and if in consequence they were to be allowed to send Representatives and Senators to Congress as freely as if the war had not occurred, the Southern Representatives acting in accord and perfect amity with the Northern Democratic party, strong everywhere except in New England, and not utterly powerless even there, would endeavor to legalize the Southern debt, and to make it as binding upon the whole people as the debt of the North. It is impossible to say whether this fear were well or ill founded, or whether the Southern States would not have divided among themselves their war debt, according to population, and made it a State instead of a National responsibility. However this may be, the victorious Republican party, acting through Mr. Johnson, elected by them, but not their man—and having few if any sentiments or principles in common with them, except the one great principle that the Union must be preserved at any cost, at the cost even of liberty and solvency—imposed upon the prostrate South the condition, the sine qua non, that it should, in its several States, utterly repudiate the Southern debt. Repudiation was a word and an idea which it was in the highest degree unwise and impolitic to familiarize the mind of either the Northern or the Southern people. The word should never have been uttered, much less should its acceptance as a rule of conduct have been imposed at the point of the bayonet upon a people who never dreamed of such dishonesty, and who would have been contented to pay their war debt, as a debt of honor due among themselves, if time had been allowed, and fate in future years had been propitious. Whatever comes of it, the North must bear the blame of the forcible application of the legal sponge to a liability which one-half of the country then considered, and still considers, to be sacred. Unfortunately the idea of repudiation, like that of which the poet sings, is one which a nation perhaps and if we may judge from the tone of the Northern press, it is one which a considerable section of the Northern people do not regard with any particular horror. The wealthy trading and commercial classes, the members of the learned professions, the cultivated people who have studied history, and generally the natural aristocracy of the country, the educated and the refined, whether rich or in humble circumstances, look upon any possible repudiation of the debt as the greatest possible calamity and disgrace that could befall the nation. But these are not the majority. These are not the people who are all powerful to elect members to Congress, or whose opinions shape the policy of the Union. They are not the people to whom a vulgar press appeals for support and popularity. They are not the people on whom the burden of taxation falls with the severest weight, and who would doubtless bear the load were it doubled or trebled in oppressiveness, rather than sanction any resort to an act of national bankruptcy. Herein lies the greatest future danger of the Union. The reaction against the financial excesses of the war has but just begun. The tide of factitious prosperity, after it ceased to flow, remained for a little while quiescent at its fullest height, and then began to ebb. The ebb continues, and is exposing evils, and laying bear ghastly sights upon the shore, which few imagined and still fewer care to behold. The working classes are suffering and discontented, and every man has a vote. If these classes once become thoroughly imbued with and reconciled to the idea of repudiation—if they teach themselves or are taught by others that it will be better to make a clean sweep of all past liabities, and start afresh—and if the wire pullers and organisers of party, and the people who hunger and thirst for office, and the emoluments and distinctions which accompany it, makes this an election cry and the main plank of a political platform on which a President is elected—who shall say that the learned judge mentioned at the opening of our article, though he spoke in jest, did not utter so much truth and wisdom as if he had spoken in earnest?"

The "learned judge" referred to is represented as having been asked to run for the Presidency in opposition to Mr. Lincoln, on a war platform, whereupon he replied, "I don't want to be President, and I don't approve of your war platform; but if I did want to be President, I should wait for four years after the conclusion of peace. We shall all be ready for repudiation by that time; and I should run on a repudiation platform and carry all before me." Most American readers will, we suspect, regard this "learned judge" as a blood relation of the Mrs. Harris family, an altogether apocryphal personage created by the Tory Magazine in the same spirit, and for pursoses similar to those which instigated Mrs. Gamp in the invention of her favorite myth.

THE SOUTHERN DEBT.

The Confederate debt, the Tory writer thinks, may yet be paid by the Southern States as "a debt of honor." After stating the Federal debt at the "too-magnificent total" of $4,000,000,000, he proceeds:

"But this sum, large as it is, does not represent the whole indebtedness of the Americans. It represent merely the amount which the North expended in the conquest of the South, and which that very conquest prevented the South from contributing to in any appreciable proportion. The amount of debt which the South incurred in resisting the invading armies and fleets of the North is known even to the Southern people. There has been no one to 'take stock' of it. There has been no responsible minister either acquainted with the details or authorized to make them known. The Southern people feel and know that they and their children are ruined; that the wealth of a whole generation, in one of the most fertile portions of the habitable globe, has been expended in a gallant but useless struggle; and that if they were to estimate their debt as fully equal to that of the North, they might possibly underrate it. In the North, it was true, there was all but limitless waste, but in the South there was all but limitless destruction. The South owes nothing beyond the limits of its own impoverished and devastated States, except the cotton loan effected in England, which some day or other, if it have the power, it may possibly recognise as a debt of honor, more sacred than if it were a debt recoverable by process of law. That debt is but a poor two millions and a half sterling or thereabouts; but the debt which it incurred to its own people is probably not far short in amount of the Federal debt of the North. Putting it at only half of the Federal debt, and adding the two debts together, we arrive at the stupendous sum of 6,000 million dollars, or 1,200 millions of pounds sterling!"

JEAN INGELOW CRITICISED.

Mrs. Harriet Prescott Spofford contributes a rather rambling review of Jean Ingelow's new volume to the September number of the Galaxy, in which the author of the "Story of Doom" is awarded a place among the "great poets" of our language. He gives a few extracts:

"Miss Ingelow, in the present volume, more than realizes the promise of her first; for although there is no minor piece in this one quite equaling the immortal "High Tide," neither is there in the former volume anything to hint of the sustained height and strength of the "Story of Doom." The poet gives us evidence that she has by no means escaped from all those intricacies of affectation which so often make her hard to follow and sometimes, indeed, often dull, but she loads them with so much beauty that it is difficult to quarrel with her for daring to sing as she chooses, and the music of her verses is so rich and so abounding that one is inclined to rest content without wearying and seeking far for hidden meanings. Indeed, what gives Miss Ingelow real troubadour rank is this singing quality of her poems, their intrinsic melody, which lends them the character of written tunes, so that they are in poetry the counterparts of 'Songs without Words,' in music. In pure and perfect poetry, philosophy has little place; for it is only when philosophy has done its most and can do no more, that poetry has a right to lift its voice; the poet exults in the loveliness of Nature—in the Creator, manifested through creation—his song is the last and best result—it is the light of the world: but when he goes exploring mysteries and deep reasonings, he goes groping in the dark—and none but Homer and nightingales sing in the dark. Thus when one is obliged in Miss Ingelow's pages, or another's to read a thing twice to discover its sense, it would have been as well in the first place to skip it. Of the few rhapsodies and philosophies, however, in the book under the notice, the most are so much of a religious kind as to impress one through their fervor, a sort of methodistical warmth and raptnre, coloring them, now and then as expressions of feeling acquiring value to others than the subject of it—as in the paraphrase of the conclusion of the one hundred and second psalm:

The heavens are the work of thy hands;
They shall perish, but thou shalt endure:
Yea, they all shall wax old,
But thy throne is established, O God, and thy years are made sure;
They shall perish, but thou shalt endure—
They shall pass like a tale that is told.

"This religious vein of the volume culminates in the 'Song for the Night of Christ's Ressurrection,' which the author calls, 'a humble imitation,' and which is a very humble one. There are a few successful sentences, such as the opening one.

It is the noon of night,
And the world's Great Light
Gone out, she widow-like doth carry her.

"While there is a certain Miltonic ring in the line

And shed out comforting light among the stars;

but the remainder of the poem, in view of the attempt, is trivial, with the exception of an image of the fatal sisters sitting disconsolate that they may not cut the thread, and of the following stanzas:

Last, with amazed cry,
The hosts asunder fly,
Leaving an empty gulf of blackest hue;
Whence straightway shooteth down,
By the Great Father thrown
A mighty angel, strong and dread to view;
And at his fall the rocks are rent
The waiting world doth quake with mortal tremblement

The regions far and near
Quail with a pause of fear,
More terrible than aught since time began;
The winds, that dare not fleet,
Drop at his awful feet.
And in its bed wails the wild ocean;

Then, with great dread and wail,
Fall down, like storms of hail,
The legions of the lost in fearful wise;
And they whose blissful race
Peoples the better place,
Lift up their wings to cover their fair eyes,
And through the waxing saffron brede.
Till they are lost in light, recede, and yet recede.

"These lines, and the peaceful quiet of those succeeding them, induce one to say that if the 'Hymn on the Morning of Christ's Nativity,' had been written, the 'Song for the Night of Christ's Resurrection' would have been a good poem; but, taken as a whole, both this poem and 'Gladys and her Island' have the air of a school day theme—an endeavor to see how much can be said on a stated subject; and while with a different title—Miss Ingelow is seldom fortunate in her titles—the former poem might fully rival Mrs. Browning's 'Dead Pan,' the attempt to tread side by side with Milton on his table-lands and mountain summits is courageous, not to say presumptuous."

Mrs. Spofford concludes her criticism as follows:

"With all that poetic power which sublimates the real things of life, Miss Ingelow is a close observer, and the capacity of closed observation is the next best thing to imagination. How every one that loves nature must recognise this truth of landscape or sea-view:

In remembrance though I lay them up,
They are forever, when I come to them,
Better than I had thought—and who has not seen, with her,

The Summer stars
Come starting out of nothing.

"Combine this faculty of observation with the imaginative gift—which combination is perhaps the true source of the descriptive power—and every saying becomes a happy one. Thus our author speaks of a painter as one

Content to give his mind
To the enrichment of mankind
And the laying up of light
In men's houses—

and of forest trees she says that

They stood close
And awful; drank the light as it dropped,
And kept the dusk of ages at their roots.

"The immagination which flies like the sun's ray, searching out the deeps of space with light, must forever remain the highest attribute of the human mind, all statisticians to the contrary. We have quoted largely enough to prove our poet's authority to claim a portion of the purple with Mrs. Browning and Anne Whitney. Without having so large a nature as Mrs. Browning, she is her equal in many special powers, sometimes, as in her various melody of rythme, surpassing her, and failing only in that ability which Mrs. Browning held of inspiring her admirers with passionate personal devotion. It has been the habit to class Jean Ingelow with Miss Rossetti and a host of miner singers, but she rises above the level ocean. And although other things in this book may come nearer the heart and the fancy, yet we think the reader, on turning its last leaf, will pronounce with us that the 'Story of Doom' is one of the most magnificent things that have been given this generation."

MISCELLANY.

CARLYLE is out with another of his characteristic "latter day" revelations. He proclaims to the perverse generation his opposition to the Reform movement in England, his contempt for the abolition of slavery in America, his scorn of democracy in all its forms, and his faith in despotism as the one great principle which is to work out the salvation of mankind. He announces, as a living fact, that the democratic movement in England must go on its logical end; that England must, before long, take the Niagara leap of completed democracy. At the same time he prophesies that the triumph will be short, and that the world must finally go back to the good old régime of kings and oligarchies.

THE leading poem in Mr. Buchanan's forthcoming volume of verse is the story of a fisherwoman on the coast of Scotland, entitled "Meg Blane." Of the other long Scotch poems, one entitled "The Northern Wooing" is a love-story; another has for theme the too-celebrated Highland evictions; and a wild Convenanting piece, entitled "The Battle of Drumlie Moor." Mr. Buchanan's prose volume, "David Gray, &c." will contain, besides the biography which gives the book its name, papers on English and American poets, and on the principles of poetic art in general.

"THE Book of Artists: American Artist Life," by H. T. Tuckerman, is to be published by Putman & Son, and will comprise biographical and critical sketches of the painters of America, early as well as late, and an account of notable pictures and private collections, will be a large octavo, illustrated by a portrait of Mr. Huntington, President of the National Academy of Design. A limited number of copies will be printed on large paper, for extra illustration, and twenty-five copies on quarto, with extra photographs, both for subscribers only.

MR. JOHN STUART MILL has had conferred upon him the highest honors at the disposal of the law facultiy of the University of the Halle. The same faculty refused a like honor to Count Bismarck, though when a student he matriculated in law.

A DICTIONARY—perhaps the first of its kind—will shortly be published at Gottingen. It is an explanation of Egyptian hieroglyphics. Its author is Dr. Brugsch, Prussian Consul at Cairo. The book will contain the meaning of about five thousand eight hundred signs.

THE inexhaustable Edmund Yates is about to publish a novel in a new Liverpool paper, bearing the name of the "Leader"—a title made famous in journalism several years ago by a London paper started by Mr. Thornton Hunt and Mr. G. H. Lewes.

MESSRS. VIRTUE & Co., purpose commencing, in October, the publication of a new monthly magazine, under the editorship of Anthony Trollope. It will be called the New Metropolitan Magazine.

MR. G. P. PUTNAM has finally determined to revive Putnam's Monthly, under the title of Putnam's Magazine, in January, 1868.

THE Rev. Charles Kingsley the English novelist and poet, is on his way to the United States.

SUNLIGHT.

A blue haze in the distance lies,
The crisp green meadows are newly shorn,
Cloudlets drift in the Summer skies,
Birds are lone in the fragrant thorn.

The leaves, like lovers, kiss in the breeze;
And over the fields of glossy wheat,
Like ripples glancing on sunny seas,
Light winds dance on their fairy feet.

The river, glimmering to the sun,
Like a forest of templar lances shows,
Motionless as a kneeling nun,
The gray spire shines from cottage rows.

Swifter than swallow down the wind,
O'er the bridge and through the vale,
The engine rushes, and far behind
Wreaths of luminous vapors sail.

To one long pent in city lane,
Noting the Spring by slow degrees;
Of Summer little but warmth and rain,
What magic in such works as these!

The breast expands as to night dew,
Wood violets spring in haunts of dove,
Hope brightens to her brightest hue,
And the heart glows with faith and love.

WILKINS ON CALISTHENICS.

BY JOHN QUILL.

I WAS down at Old Castle, Delaware, last week, and Mr. and Mrs. Wilkins occupied the room in the hotel next to mine. They talked very loud, and as I could not sleep, there was nothing for me to do but lie still and listen. This is about what took place:

"I tell you, Mrs. Wilkins, you've got to put a stop to it; I won't have it. This thing has been going on long enough, and it's about played out. Here you've been agoing to that gymnasium now nigh on to six months, and you're getting to be a perfect she Samson; you're getting more muscle than any woman who moves in good society's got any right to have. I don't want to be married to an Amazon, I tell you; I don't want my wife going about trying how many fifty-six pound weights she can lift; I don't want to be tied to a woman who hits from the shoulder, do I? and who can knock an ox down with her fist, and smash a door panel with one lick? Not much I don't, and I say I won't have it."

"But, Mr. Wilk—"

"Oh, there's no use of talking, for it's got to be stopped. Ain't you ashamed of yourself, and you, a mother of nine children, to be dressing yourself up in Bloomer costume and showing your thick ankles—

"Mr. Wilkins, you——"

"Showing your clumsy ankles—you needn't get mad, for they are thick, and you know it—and swinging dumb bells and sticks and clubs, trying to dislocate your arms, so as to give me another doctor's bill to pay, and reduce me to bankruptcy; I'll sue for divorce, I will, by George, if it ain't stopped; I won't put up with it any longer, if I do, hang me."

"Mr. Wilkins, do stop swearing."

"Swearing? I'll curse until daybreak if you aggravate me so. It is enough to make a man swear, and you know it is. I tell you it ain't respectable for you to go to that gymnasium, and let that booby of a teacher put his arm around you all the time he is pretending to show you how to move your elbows."

"Mr. Wilkins, this is scand——"

"To move your elbows, and then for you to come home and begin exercising yourself on the joists in the garret, pulling yourself up to see how many times you can touch your chin. In my opinion you'd better be down stairs practicing with a bar of soap and a washboard—a good deal better than doing that, or going out into the yard and trying to balance a clothes prop on your chin."

"Why, M-i-s-t e-r Wilkins, I never——"

"Don't Mister Wilkins me, you can't say you never did it, for I know you did. Didn't I see you the other day while I was at the back parlor window? You'd better say next that you never tried to catch the dining-room chairs by the rounds and hold them out at arm's length?"

"Of course I d—"

"But I know you did, though, and I tell you I'm sick of it. I don't want to live all my life with a woman who can whip me. I expect you'll be practicing on me next—I expect nothing else than you'll be trying to see if you can throw me. But I don't want to have anything to do with you. If you come wrestling around me, you'll get hurt. I give you fair warning; I won't stand any of your nonsense."

"Mr. Wilkins, I declare you're too bad, for—"

"I know I am; I know I don't suit you; I know you wish you were married to another man. You'd like me to have a plug-muss with you every day, and have me try to beat you at hitting, and get me to go around this community and brag of your muscle. But I ain't proud of you; I'm mortified about it. It pains me to think that you are so depraved. I know you ain't satisfied, so you'd better apply for a divorce and go and get married to the Belgian giant, or some prize-fighter, and spar with him, and crowd him to the ropes, and sluice him in the gob, if you know what that means, and I dare say you do, for you learn all that low slang down to the gymnasium."

"Mr. Wilkins, I won't stand this any longer, it is perfectly—"

"Oh, I know it is, I know you won't stand it. I expect now you will get up out of bed and try to throw me out of the window and break my legs, or upset the stove on me. I expect that; this is the chance you've been a laying for all this time; I know it; I'm your victim; kill me, murder me, put me out of my misery, and then go down and marry that prize-fighter, that's what you want. But there's one woman will shed some tears over my grave; you'll be glad to get rid of me, but there's one woman will be sorry."

"Wilkins, who do you mean?"

"Oh, never you mind; you'd hate her if you knew she liked me, and maybe you'd exercise yourself on her, but I won't give you a chance."

"It's that horrid, nasty Maria Browne, I know; she never puts her foot in this house again."

"Yes, there's one woman would be sorry to see me go, and if you ever die I'm a going to marry her—"

"You brute, how can you talk so?"

"Marry her, and see if I can't have some peace of my life. She won't go to any gymnasium and behave as you do——"

"It's that Browne, I know."

"Because she didn't approve of such things, I know, for she said so, and she thinks that you——"

"Has she been daring to talk about me to you, the vile minx?"

"Yes, she has; and she says for her part she thinks that—that——"

"Well, out with it."

"Oh, that——that——that you——oh, I guess I won't repeat it—it ain't necessary,"

"But I will know."

"Well, then—but no, it was told me in confidence."

"Phugh! I don't care what Maria Browne thinks; she may say what she pleases; I don't care a cent."

"But it wasn't Maria, but the other woman, and she observed—but no——"

"I won't hear it; don't you dare to tell me; I wouldn't listen if you was to bellow it into my ears."

"Well, then, I'll tell you; she said that——"

"Shut up, or I'll stuff a pillow down your throat."

"That of all the Jezebels she ever did hear of—"

"I tell you I won't listen to you."

"Ever did hear of, you were the worst, and if she were me she'd give warning to the storekeepers not to trust you, and make you wear old fashioned bonnets for the rest of your natural life."

"And she said she didn't wonder I was miserable, for any man would be who was married to such an old lunatic—"

"John Wilkins, I'll be the death of you. Take that now! —there—there—there."

Here there was a series of thumps upon the floor, the noise of a scrimmage, then a groan, and I turned over and went to sleep, while Mrs. Wilkins came down to breakfast the next morning dressed all ready to go to the gymnasium and reported that Mr. Wilkins was taken sick during the night, and couldn't leave his room. But I know what's the matter with poor Wilkins, and I sympathize with him in his misery.

Universalism will celebrate the one hundredth aniversary of its existence in America, in 1870. The Society has now seven newspapers and three magaziues, with 700 ministers and 500 organizations.

San Francisco Pioneer Matting and Mat Company.—Cocoanut fibre matting has been proved by long use in all parts of the world to be the cheapest, most endurable and in every way the best ever invented. A manufactory of this article was established in San Francisco a little more than a year ago. These San Francisco manufactures far surpasses the Foreign ones, and since the establishment of the San Francisco Pioneer Mat and Matting Company the price of the Foreign article has been reduced from $1 50 per yard to 75 cents. The imported matting has a tariff of 30 per cent. levied on it, and thus our home manufactured article as well as being intrinsically the best, is the cheapest. C. W. Clark, wholesale dealer in paper hangings, at the corner of Sansome and Clay streets, is the agent of the company.

California Gloves.—A Glove manufactory has been started at No. 526 Merchant street, between Montgomery and Sansome, for the manufacture of buckskin gloves for miners, lumbermen, farmers, teamsters, draymen, expressmen, and sportsmen. A large force is employed cutting out and sewing these gloves, which, owing to their superiority of material and workmanship, will outwear two pairs of Eastern made ones. The imported buckskin gloves are made from "split" buckskins, and are sewed by machinery. The California gloves are all sewed by hand, and are manufactured from the unsplit buckskin. Try them.

The place to buy jewelry is at F. D. Ring's new store, No. 540 Market street, opposite Second. Mr. Ring has an entire new stock of the latest styles of jewelry and settings. Mr. Ring is a practical workman in his art, and pays particular attention to all kinds of repairing. Contrast his prices with the Montgomery street jewelry stores before purchasing.

Fast Young Ladies.—In order to be a fast young lady, it is necessary to lay aside all reserve and refinement—everything that savors of womanly weakness; to have no troublesome scruples, but be ready to accord an appreciating smile to the broadest joke. There must be no feeling of dependence on the stronger sex; but, by adopting, as far as decency permits, masculine attire, masculine habits and masculine modes of expression, accompanied by a thorough knowledge of slang, and a fluency in using it, these ladies show themselves to be above all narrow-minded prejudices. There must be no thinking about other people's feelings; if people will be thin-skinned, let them keep out of their way at all events. Should "mamma" raise her voice in feeble remonstrance, the fast young lady impresses upon her that "she is no judge of these matters. In her old school days, every one was slow; but it is quite changed now." In short, to sum up, to be a fast young lady, modesty, delicacy, refinement, respect for superiors, consideration for the aged, must all be set aside; and boldness, independence, irreverence, brusqueness, and we fear too often, heartlessness, must take their place.

What Jennie June Says.—Mrs. J. C. Croly (Jennie June) testifies:

Q.—Do you, or not, prefer the Grover & Baker Machine for family sewing, and if so, why? State the reasons fully.

A.—I prefer it to any machine. I like the Grover & Baker Machine in the first place, because if I had any other I should still want a Grover & Baker; and having a Grover & Baker it answers the purpose of all the rest. It does a greater variety of work, and it is easier to learn than any other. I like the stitch because of its beauty and strength, and because although it can be taken out, it don't rip, not even by cutting every other stitch.

Q.—Among your acquaintances state whether this machine and its work is preferred to other machines?

A.—Yes, it is, especially within the last two years. I know three other ladies who have sold off other machines—sold at reduced prices—in order to get Grover & Baker, but recently and they are very enthusiastic about their new machines.

[From testimony taken before the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, on the application for the extension of the patent for the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.]

Wine and Tea Depot.—At last we have established in our midst a long needed Family Wine, Liquor and Tea Depot at 609 Sacramento street, a few doors above Montgomery, under the control of Messers. Whiting & Berry. We say long needed from the fact that heretofore ladies could not enter the numerous sample rooms or corner groceries to purchase the necessaries for their family. These enterprising gentlemen have at last overcome that obstacle, and have followed in the footsteps of the celebrated Messrs. Bigelow & Dawes, of Loudon, Binninger & Co., New York, and of Cozzens & Co., Washington, D. C. Ladies can go shopping here and purchase their supplies without having their ears shocked with bar-room slang. Mr. Whiting is an old Californian, and is well known in this community as an upright business man. He has represented this district in the State Senate. This wine and tea store has already attracted the attention of the public by its stylish appearance, and the reputation already achieved by the choice wines, liquors teas sold there.

Chiriqui Images.—We have had the pleasure of examining a quantity of gold received by Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., from Honduras, in payment for their medicines, which are extensively sold throughout Central America. Among massive crosses, bracelets, and chains, are the rude images which have been taken from the graves of the Chiriqui chiefs—birds, turtles, serpents, bugs and reptiles done in solid gold. They carry us back beyond historic times, to periods and places where barbarism reigned supreme. They seem to come here now in mute appeal from the winding sheets of their ancestors, to ask for the simple Indians in the mountains, medical protection from cultivated skill, against diseases which gather them up in too early graves. Ignorant and unlettered as they are, they have learned of the white man enough to know where to apply for relief, and what will bring it. Our well known townsman, above named, inform us that they require their remittances from foreign countries now to be made in silver and gold.—Lowell (Mass.) Sentinel.

The Dew of Eden.—This extraordinary cosmetic is something entirely different from any now in use. It is not an enamel, or a paint, or a powder; nor is it one of those pernicious preparations that impart a temporary bloom to the complexion at the expense of permanent injury. Strictly speaking, it is not a cosmetic at all, but rather a cleansing, healing and medicinal fluid. It preserves the freshness and beauty of the skin, and restores them when lost. It prevents the formation of tan, freckles, and wrinkles, and tends gradually to remove them, where they already exist. It can be obtained at 311, Kearny street, and also at McDonald & Co's., corner of Pine and Sansome streets. For further particulars see an advertisement on the fourteenth page of to-day's Californian.

"Our Opera."—Capt. John H. May has removed his popular saloon, bearing the above taking title, a few doors above, in the fine store, so long occupied by Braverman and Levy. "Our Opera" is now directly opposite the Opera House, and is a very convenient place to take a drink. Capt. May's reputation for preparing the best wines and liquors that can be obtained in the city and a plentiful supply of hot water—on cold nights.

Saddles, Harness, Etc.—C. F. Hayward, for many years engaged in the saddle and harness trade, has opened a store at No. 305 Battery street, for the sale and manufacture of harness of every description and of the best material, also saddle and harness blankets made to order. Hayward will be pleased to see his old friends from the country as well of the city. Give him a call.

"The" Hat Store.—The Hat Store, No. 647 Washington street, is the place to purchase a stylish silk or felt hat. "The" Hat Store turns out its full show of the latest style of hats—made to order or ready made—call and leave your orders.

A LOVE STORY.

I.

"NOW hush, my dearie, hush, there's a man! Your mother is a poor creature, but she can take care of her little lad yet, and she will. It will never be she that will sit by and see him thrashed—not for all the Langtons and all the book-learning in England!"

The speaker sat in her cottage kitchen, in an arm-chair by the fireside, plaiting straw, a feeble, sickly-looking woman, with a querulous face. She had fretted herself into ill-health two years ago when her husband died, John Morton, the Brent fisherman, who had lost his life one wild night coming home round the headland with his laden boat; and she was never likely, with her indolent and repining nature, to be anything but an invalid now for the rest of her days.

On the stool at her feet sat the boy whose unmerited whipping she bewailed—a small child, disfigured by abundant weeping. The room had also one other occupant, a dark-eyed girl of nineteen or twenty, who sat in the window sewing.

She sat sewing, but let her work drop down upon her knees as Mrs. Morton spoke, and raised a face that was full of a strange kind of pain.

"Mother," she said, in a low intense tone, "I could not help it."

"You didn't try to help it," Mrs. Morton retorted quickly "You wouldn't care if Langton broke every bone in his body—as he has nearly done—bad luck to his ugly face," she cried, bitterly.

"Mother, hush!"

As Mrs. Morton spoke these last words the girl's eyes had flashed, and her fingers had contracted almost convulsively.

And yet few others—men or women—in the parish, would have been much concerned at a far greater amount of vituperation passed upon Philip Langton; few who had had any dealings with him would have been disposed to stand up very warmly in his defence. He was not a popular man in Brent.

He had come to the place a year ago to be master of the village school—the rector's school, as it was called. High testimonials had procured him the appointment, nor indeed were his abilities ever questioned; they were all that could be desired, and more than were needed for the post. He was found, however, to be violent-tempered, haughty, reserved, independent, and he soon got an ill name alike with the rector and scholars.

He had been born and brought up as a gentleman. His father and mother had died when he was a child; at eighteen he had quarreled with the uncle under whose guardianship he had been brought up, and utterly without resources of his own had left his house, and from that time to this his life had been a restless battle and struggle. He was clever, ambitious, and determined—and friendless. In twelve years, spite of his talents, he had risen to no higher post than this humble one of village schoolmaster.

In the same school at Brent, three months after the arrival of Mr. Langton, Margaret Morton had been appointed mistress. She was young to hold such a post, but since her father's death, the support both of her mother and brother had fallen almost entirely upon her; and this circumstance, when the place became vacant last winter, had given her, in the estimation of the kind-hearted pastor, a strong claim to the appointment. She had besides been monitress in the school for some years; she was a good girl, too, and the rector liked her, and before she had occupied her new post for a month, it became clear that the whole school was of one feeling with him.

I say she was clever. In a very short time Philip Langton discovered that. Presently, moved, I suppose, by some feeling of kindness, he offered, if she cared for it, to help her to advance her studies. Perhaps she too had some ambition, some desire to be at a future time more than a village schoolteacher. Be that as it may she accepted his offer, and she had now been his pupil for six months. He had found her quick, earnest, and trusting: repaying that trust, he had made himself to her patient, unwearied and gentle. Master and pupil suited each other.

It was evening, seven o'clock on a June day. The school had long been cleared of its throng of children; books and slates were put away into their places; the brick floor was clean swept. At the girls' room the door was locked, but the boys' room was still open, and alone, at the master's desk stood Mr. Langton, a thin slight, man, with a dark, resolute face, by no means prepossessing or handsome.

He used to give Margaret her lesson usually about this hour, and he was waiting for her now. To-day, however, he had to wait a quarter of an hour or more before she came. When she did come at last, he was writing, and only raised his head for a moment as he heard her step.

"You are late," was all he said.

"Yes; I was detained a little while at home."

She had brought out her books and arranged them before he moved from his desk. Coming at length in silence, he drew a seat beside her and took the open book out of her hands

"What have you prepared?"

"Two pages."

He began to question her upon them forthwith. She could usually answer what he asked her readily, to-day, however, her thoughts were evidently wandering. He tried more than once to fix her attention, but still, in spite of that, the lesson was ill said.

He put down the book at last.

"You are not well to-day?" he asked.

"O yes, I am well," she said quickly.

"What are you thinking of then? Not of your lesson?"

"No." She hesitated a moment.

"Tell me."

"I wanted to speak to you, Mr. Langton," she said, suddenly. "You were very angry with my brother this morning."

"Well?"

"You hurt him very much."

"I meant to hurt him."

"He is very young."

"Young or old he did wrong."

There was a pause. Mr. Langton sat forward, leaning his dark face on his hand.

"Well?" he said again.

Her eyes had fallen. When he questioned her, they looked back to his face; she began to speak again, and gradually as she spoke her cheek flushed hot and bright.

"Could you not be a little gentler with them—a little less angry with them when they do wrong? I know that they must be punished; I know that Tom deserved to be punished to-day; but if you could be a little gentler! When you are angry every one misunderstands you. O, Mr. Langton!" she cried, "you don't know half of what is said against you."

The tears had sprung up into her eyes; her earnest distress had filled her face with a look almost of passion.

"I cannot attend to all the fools' tongues in Brent," was his scornful answer. "Stand you by me, and they may talk as they please."

"But could you not bear a little with them?" she pleaded timidly. "Mr. Langton, you must not think that they can do you no harm. They can harm you; they send every complaint they have against you to the rectory. They are saying already"—the poor girl's voice almost broke down—"they are saying already," that you will not be much longer here."

"Ay? are they saying that?" and he laughed.

She gave him one sad look, and then dropped her head, and spoke no more. Her clasped hands lay on her lap; presently as she sat, large tears fell down and wet them. She never moved; he also sat motionless. She thought he did not know she was weeping, but she was wrong there; he was conscious of every tear she shed.

Quietly watching her, he let the silence last for several minutes; then bending to her at last, he said these words:

"If it comes to that—if I am not to be here much longer—Margaret, will you let me leave Brent as poor as when I came."

She started as he spoke, but she neither replied to him nor raised her head. He did not withdraw his look from her; after a few moments he spoke again.

"I have loved no woman before. You are my first love, Margaret. Will you be my wife?"

She answered him then.

"What am I that you should ask me this?" she said in agitated voice. "I am nothing but a poor, ignorant girl. O, no—no—no!" she cried. "Your wife must not be one like me!"

"Margaret!" he said.

She had not looked up till then, but at that call, as if its passionate tenderness compelled her, she raised her face. What need was there to speak again? By her two hands he drew her near to him, and took her in his arms.

II.

They told no one of their engagement, for they knew the outcry that would on all hands follow its discovery, and no one suspected it. For three months they were both infinitely happy.

Even in the school during these months there was an improvement. Margaret's power over Mr. Langton was very great; one word or one look from her, one touch of her hand, could subdue him in his angriest and haughtiest moods; and rendered pliable by his love for her, he strove, and often successfully, to bend his pride and curb his temper. Thus, for a time, all things went wonderfully well. But this hollow kind of peace was not a thing to last. Margaret could not be always by his side, or in his sight; and one day, at length, in an unlucky hour, suddenly without warning, the three months tranquility expired.

Mr. Langton quarreled with the rector. The rector was really wrong in the ground of quarrel, and Philip right; but Philip in his indignation, forgot all deference due to him as his employer, stood up to him as equal to equal, and the end of that day's business was, that when the school-house was closed in the afternoon, the key of it went into the rector's pocket.

He had written the sentence of their separation. Margaret knew that, but she did not reproach him. They met together that evening for the last time, at the foot of a cliff beside the sea which had witnessed many a meeting of theirs before, with the calm wide water stretching from their feet.

"It must have come sooner or later," he said. "Do not grieve so for it, my darling. I was wasting time here. My going now will only bring me back to you the sooner."

She looked up wistfully to his face.

"The future is all so dark," she cried; "we cannot see into it. I feel as if I was holding the last link of a golden chain; and to-night—to-night before I sleep—it will have fallen from me."

"No; it will not have fallen!" he answered, cheerfully. "Your hand grasping one end, mine holding fast the other, it will remain stretched out between us until the hour I come back. Margaret, I will work for you, I will struggle for you; I will rise for you. And you," he cried, "wait for me! for no power, but the power of God taking my life, shall keep me from coming back."

"I will wait," she said, "I will wait years and years. If you die before I see you again I will wait for you till we meet in heaven."

III.

She did wrong to keep their engagement from her mother. Poor Margaret knew that, and was troubled by the knowledge; but she had not courage to awaken the storm of abuse which she knew well would fall upon her head should she divulge it, so she let time pass on, and told her mother nothing. She kept her secret for two years, hearing from her lover occasionally, but not often, and living on her silent trust in him.

After these two years were ended, one day, a bright summer afternoon, Mrs. Morton stood at her cottage door, shading her eyes from the strong sunlight as she looked eagerly towards the school-house, whence the school-children were coming pouring out and swarming down the road, and whence presently, with a step that was slower than theirs, came Margaret. Mrs. Morton's tongue was loosened as she drew near.

"O, dear me! what a time that school does keep you!" she ejaculated. "Such a state I've been in all day; my poor head's just worn out with thinking. Margaret, you never will guess as long as you live but what do you think the postman brought me here this morning?"

"What, mother?" As she spoke Margret's whole face flushed.

"O, you may well ask wha I tell you you'll never guess. Why, he brought a letter from your uncle Tom in America—who might have been dead and buried, for anything I've known, these five years—and he's sent us money to go out to him. Yes—he says we're to go out to him, every one of us, and he'll keep us as long as we live. Why, Margaret!" Mrs. Morton cried. "Margaret!" God bless the girl, are you going to faint?"

"Mother, come in. Mother, come in, and shut the door."

White and trembling, Margaret passed into the kitchen. She let her mother join her there, and grasping her hands tight within her own, she began to speak hurriedly, in a low, constrained, almost hard tone.

"Mother, I cannot go; I cannot leave England," she said. "If you go, you must go alone. No—no—don't look like that at me. I have had news too, to-day. O, mother!" she cried, all hardness suddenly breaking down as she clasped Mrs. Morton's hands upon her breast. "speak gently to me, look kindly on me. Dear mother! dear mother! I am going to be Philip Langton's wife"

Mrs. Morton stood before her daughter, face to face, and caught her by her arms.

"You are going to be what?" burst from her lips. "Going to be what?" she cried.

"I am going to be his wife." Her answer came almost triumphantly now. "I promised him long before he went. He wrote to me to-day, to tell me that he could marry me. And he is coming!" she cried, the light flashing into her face.

It was the last flash of gladness that lighted that poor face for many a day to come. Margaret had told her secret and what followed was a storm of tears and passionate reproaches so violent as to exhaust all the small stock of strength that Mrs. Morton had, and force her, before many hours were over, to her bed, where she lay and sobbed and moaned all night, and by morning had worn herself ill enough to make Margaret unable to leave the house. Throughout the whole day, from morning to night, her daughter sat beside her listening to her reproaches, and her self-bewailings and pionate entreaties. For years past, indeed for well nigh her whole life long, Mrs. Morton had been very well aware that her strength lay in her fretful pertinacity, and her deadness to every other creature's comfort but her own. In former days she had ruled her husband by her querulous selfishness for years she had ruled her daughter by the same means: selfishness was to her her armor of proof, and so she resorted to it now. Margaret had worked for her, and devoted herself to her, and humored her, and Mrs. Morton felt that it would be hard now to do without this filial care; and feeling this, whatever a generous and noble nature could least bear to re itself accused of, these things did the mother launch at her daughter's head. She huog herself as a dead weight rouud Margaret's neck, and then, wringing her hands, called every one to witness how Margaret was aoout to throw her mother off.

For two days Margaret bore this persecution almost in silence, sitting hour after hour by her mother's side, with her poor heart growing cold and faint within her. What should she do? They were all against her—mother, brother, friends; she had no one to take her part, no one—not a single one—to utter Philip Langton's name except with abuses or reproach. What should she do? Hour after hour for those two weary days the poor girl's desolate question went up to Heaven.

And slowly and relentlessly, as those hours went on, the hope that had been her torch so long paled and died out. She fought for two days, and then the battle ended. When the evening of the second day came she knew that she must give him up.

She must give him up—her love!—her life! She was sitting when the struggle ended by her mother's side, who, worn out with forty-eight hours of fretting, was lyiog at last with closed eyes and lips. She had lain so for half an hour, her thin face shrunk, her pale cheeks hollowed with those two days' illness, and for half an hour Margaret had sat and watched her. Sat in the deep silence—the first moments of peace that had been giveu her—and watched her as she lay there, sickly and feeble and lonely, till a conviction rose within her heart that conquered her—a despairiog hopeless conviction—that she dared not leave her.

She sat when it had come, and rocked herself to and fro, crouching her head, putting out her hands and covering her face, moaning over and over again some low, unintelligible, broken-hearted words. She never changed sound or movement till Mrs. Morton's querulous voice broke on her misery. She only changed them then to raise her white face to her mother, and strive to utter words which at her first effort choked her and would not come.

And when at last, kneeling by the bedside, with her face pressed upon her outstretched hands, the poor girl uttered them, giving her broken-hearted promise that she would go, for her reward there came this answer—

"Could you not have said as much at the beginning," Mrs. Morton said, "without doing your best to kill me first? But you are still as you have been all your life—thinking of no creature in the world except yourself."

IV.

The promise was giveu, and from that time onward she was altogether passive. The chief object of every one about her was to hurry her away before Philip Langton could hear that she was going. She know this, but she never said a word. Living as they did they only needed a few days to make their preparations for departure. The rector promised, without detaining Margaret, to find a substituto for her in the school. By the end of a week they were all in readiness to go.

She sat, on the last oight, in her own room alone. Through all the week poor Langton's unanswered letter had lain upon her heart. To-night she wrote to him.

Like one whom sorrow had stunned into insensibility, she told him all that had been done; she told him of the promise she had given, almost without one demonstration of emotion. And only then, when all was said, suddenly at some stray thought—the chance recalling of a few words uttered long before—all the great agony of her heart burst forth.

"Do you remember," she said, "that eveniog when we parted, how I told you that I felt as if I had hold of the last link of a chain?"

And then—

"What am I to do?" she broke out wildly. "O my God! what am I to do? How am I to live all my life long alone? O Philip, help me! I shall die. O, if I could have seen you once more—only once more before I go! All day long—all night, as I lie awake, I think of it. O, Philip! write to me—write to me and forgive me, or my heart will break."

She had been in her new homo for a month when the answer to that appeal was brought to her. A hard and cruel answer This was what it said:

"I trusted all my happiness to you, and you have wrecked it. For this I give no forgiveness. From your solemn promise to become my wife—from your solemn promise to wait for me till I should come and claim you—no power on earth had the right to set you free. You have broken those promises of your own weak choice and will. Had I been by your side you had not dared to do this wrong to me. If you had been faithful I would have loved you as never living man will love you now. I would have cherished you as never man will cherish you. You have chosen your own lot apart from me. And I—"

The letter broke off here. To this last black desolate line there was added nothing but the passionate bitter cry—"Margaret! Margaret!"

V.

A pleasant room, with the windows opening to a terrace, and, beyond, a garden slopiog to the sea. A summer day in southern latitudes.

"And so, after all these years," cried a lady recliniog on a cushioned sofa, "Henry Fitzgibbon has come back again?"

"Ay, he has come at last."

"I am so curious to see him. We must go early, Mr. Travers, aud have a talk with him before the other people come. And with regard to the girls, Miss Morton"—Mrs. Travers raised herself a little, and turned her head—"as my sister likes you to be early, you had better join us about eight."

At the far end of the room Margaret Morton sits writing, with a cheek that nine years have paled, and a figure that their hand has made more slight. All the rounded comliness of former days is gone; and yet that calm, refined, strong face is beautiful now with a beauty it never possessed of old. The dark eyes have a deep, tender look in them, sometimes sad, oftener composed and cheerful; for she has wrought her way out of that great angnish of her youth, and it shades her years now only with a silent and subdued sadness, not any longer with passionate sorrow and revolt.

Yet the love that caused that bitter suffering has been the leading star—the refining element of her life. Its influence has led her in everythiog that she has done—in everything that she has struggled to become. She has been true to it in her whole heart and being, in spite of Philip's injustice, in spite of her own renunciation.

Sho has risen to the position of a governess in a merchant's family. Hither and thither her lot has led her, during these nine years, over that wide American continent. She is now in a pleasant southern town on the coast of Florida. She is all alone in the world. The kind uncle who brought her over is dead; the sickly mother dead, too, a year ago; her brother, the only one remaining, is a fortune-seeker in California.

"You will be at my sister's at eight o'clock," Mrs. Travers said; and at eight o'clock Margaret and her two pupils sat in Mrs. Maurice's drawing-room.

She sat before a side-table strewn with books, and whiled the time away in turoing them over. There were a few small groups of ladies in the room, making a faint buzz of conversation, but it was not loud enough to interrupt her. For a long while she read undisturbed, until the feeble buzz at last leapt into quicker animation, for the drawing-room door was opened, and new voices sounded, new faces entered and filled the room.

A few feet from where she sat there stood a small empty sofa. Toward this there presently came two persons, and took possession of it—Mrs. Travers, and a gentleman whose face was strange to Margaret. As they sat down it was he who spoke first.

"Begin from your own marriage, and tell me everything," he said. "What has become of all my old friends? I can scarcely see or hear any of them."

"I can giveo you a score of histories," she answered. "Who shall I begin with? And they fell at once into a talk together.

It might have lasted perhaps for half an hour, when, after a momentary pause, Margaret heard these words:

"In the midst of all this," Mrs. Travers' companion said, "how in the world have you contrived to be so little changed? To look at you I can scarcely believe that I have been away; yet the whole morning I have been complaining to Langton that I cannot recognize a single face I see."

She looked up with an involuntary start, but it was only for a moment. She had heard strangers called by that name before. There were more Langtons in the world than hers.

"By the way," Mrs. Travers said, "who is this Mr. Langton? Where did you pick him up?"

"Langton? O, he is a man with some name in political circles in England. He is just now secretary to Lord——"

"He is not in the room at present, is he? I am so blind—but I don't see him."

"No; he and Travers got into a discussion together, and we left them to fight it out."

They turned the talk back to their own affairs. With a low sigh Margaret stooped her face again upon her book. "It is not Philip, it is not Philip," she whispered to herself. Bending her head she shaded her eyes, and for a minute closed their lids; and before her attitude was altered, before her eyes were reopened, there upon her ear the long unheard voice.

"How beautiful your open sea is," it said. "It brings to my mind the only place where I ever lived before by the open sea—a little village in tho south of Englaod."

She looked up and saw him. That vision that nine years had robbed her of; that lover to whose memory her life, with all its struggles, successes, endurances, had been an offering. There, before her, his foot within a pace of where she sat, his dark, familiar face clear in her sight; familiar, and yet how strange, after this absence, this silence, this abnegation of nine years.

A hand was laid kindly on her arm, and on her ear came tho tones of another voice:

"You feel this room very hot," it said. "Do you not, Miss Morton? I am sure you are hot, you look so pale and tired. Come away with me, and let us take a little walk upon the terrace."

The outstretched hand drew her from her seat. O, this was cruel! There leaped up to her lips one piteous cry, one helpless cry of passionate resistance; and then she rose, and went. Away she went from where her huogry eyes had rested, to the dimly-lighted terrace.

"Now, take my arm, we will walk for a little here."

She answered "Yes," but she could not do it. She tried, and walked a dozen steps; then suddenly stood still, and cried, "Let me sit down."

She leant against a pillar near her.

"Mrs. Carlton, let me sit down! Here, where it is not light; O, here, where it is not light!" she cried.

"My dear, there is no seat; stand still one moment."

Pausing to ask no questions, Mrs. Carlton hurried to the house. She was absent for a few seconds; then she returned, and not alone. Another arm was laden with the chair that she had gone to find and another hand set it by Margaret's side.

"Thank you, Mr. Langton. Now, my dear, sit down. You will be better soon in this fresh air."

She sat down as she was bidden; helplessly, without a word. She gave no thanks.

Having come, he stayed. Deliberately and at once he took the place where she had stood, and leant against the pillar. He stood with his face partly toward her, with the light upon it.

"We shall never teach this northern snowdrop to bear our southern warmth," Mrs. Carlton said. "Mr. Langton, are all your country women so hard to accustom to new climates? Are they all such fragile creatures as this one?"

He turned his head where Margaret sat, and looked at her. Following that look there came no change upon his face, no token in him of recognition, nothing but this quiet answer:

"You are used to a warmer coloring here. Our northern snows rob English women of that."

"And yet England is a good way from the pole. And you are not like a snowdrop, Mr. Langton, at all."

"I am scarcely English; my mother was an Italian."

"Was she? I did not know. And have you lived in Italy? Ah, Mr. Langton!" she cried suddenly, in a quick outburst of southern enthusiasm, "Tell me about Italy. What parts of it do you know? Do you know Rome and Venice? Ah! tell me about them."

Her request was eager, but he was very slow to do her bidding. Possibly his thoughts were occupied to-night with other things than Italy's falling palaces and walls; yet presently her quick questionings roused him; he warmed and spoke. There, where the light fell on his face, illumining each kindling lineament, he stood and talkod to her of home, and yet in the midst of it, so calmly, quietly mingling with it, that one home figure, the center star of Margaret's life. But even he so chaoged. All calmed, softened, refined; the cold dark race, dark and irregular still, but in its whole expression grown so full of harmony and strength; its restive pride composed, its aggressive temper all subdued.

She listened to him as he talked, listened at first with a strange thrilling wonder of delight, then presently with a nameless sickening pain. Oh! she had striven all these years to reach up to his height, and he had left her in the race, as if she had not run.

"And now, after all your European wanderings," Mrs. Carlton said, "you have at last come here?"

He answered, "Yes."

"Are you going farther south?"

"No; I shall retrace my steps now."

"But not at once I hope?"

"I may leave to-morrow. If not to-morrow, still as soon as possible."

Sitting in the shadow, Margaret heard and lifted up her head, swiftly, suddenly, driven by the startling cry of her sharp misery. She lifted up her head, and her raised eyes saw——

Oh! this was no straoger's look upon her—this was no stranger's gaze, sending its keen light through her!

"So soon as to-morrow? Why, Mr. Laogton, you will have seen nothing."

"I shall have seen what I came to see," he answered.

"Ah well! About that I cannot speak," she said, laughiog; and there was a few moments' pause, which was broken presently by a sound of music coming through the opened door.

"That is Mrs. Travers' voice," Mrs. Carlton said.

"Mr. Langton you must come and hear her, she has the finest voice I koow. Miss Morton will you remain here, or come with us? You had better both come."

She went forward toward the door and Mr. Langton followed her. One moment Margaret saw the two figures stand upon the threshold; then one went forward and the other retraced his steps.

He came back in silence, calmly and quietly, to the place that he had left, into Margaret's full sight—there where she sat motionless, her clasped hands as he neared her only closing their fingers tighter.

SAN FRANCISCO,.....SATURDAY, OCTOBER 5, 1867.

AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS FROM A TORY POINT OF VIEW.

It is a wholesome corrective of national, as well of individual vanity, to endeavor occasionally to look at ourselves from the stand-point of those who most heartily dislike us. Criticism, however prejudiced, if it is sincere, is generally sure to have some colorable foundation in truth—some such approximation to it at least, as the resemblance that exists between a public man and his caricature. There was a great deal of this sort of truth in Dickens' "American Notes," and also in his "Martin Chuzzlewit;" and it was very silly of us to fly into a passion, because the novelist chose to caricature some of the more disagreeable features of our institutions and society—features which must necessarily seem peculiarly repulsive to the average Englishman. This kind of "wholesome corrective" can be enjoyed ad libitum—any particularly sensible and irascible American would find it ad nauseam—by the diligent perusal of the last batch of Tory periodical literature that has reached our shores. Blackwood is tolerably sure to administer a pill or two every month, and the London Quarterly, at longer intervals, supplies a larger, if not a stronger dose. The July number of the last named periodical contains an article entitled "Reform Essays," which is full of medicinal virtue for our national vanity, if astringency and bitterness can make it so. Among the "Essays" reviewed in the article, is one by Mr. Dicey, on "The Balance of Classes," in which the author argues for the American doctrine of the government of numbers, and another on "Popular Constituences," by Mr. Leslie Stephen, who also seems to have a strong bias in favor of democratic institutions, though he makes many damaging admissions in regard to their actual working, upon which the reviewer pounces with sneering exultation. Mr. Stephen concedes that American statesmen of the last, and of the present generation, do not come up to the European level, as did our great civilians of the epoch of the Revolution. He thinks that since then, "refined and delicate minds" have been frightened from the political arena. "The business of the country has been left to men not above joining in the dirtiest intrigues, or pandering to the lowest popular prejudices." Money and the mob "are said to be supreme in Washington; the action of Congress is also said to be determined by log-rolling and buncombe;" and the essayist does not undertake to question the substantial truth of these charges. "This is plain speaking," cries the exultant reviewer, "and when we couple with these facts the notorious truth that these evil symptoms have increased just in proportion to the increase of democracy, we seem to have made out a pretty strong case against the imitation of American institutions." Mr. Stephen, while endeavoring in all apparent loyalty and good faith to do his whole duty, as advocate, for his American clients, and for representative republican government generally, assumes the deprecatory tone of an apologist, and exhibits none of the indignant energy of the confident champion of a just cause. He declines to plead the general issue in answer to the Tory indictment against American institutions; his plea is rather one of "confession and avoidance," as it would be termed in the language of the common law. American statesmen are not great men—but that is because "the temptations to a practical life overpower intellectual training," and because a "cultivated class, or rather a class from which cultivated statesmen may be drawn, does not exist in the country." The comment of the reviewer upon Mr. Stephen's explanation, or apology, is: "This is something like the excuse for a next morning's headache, 'It wasn't the wine; it was the salmon.' Give what account you like, of the phenomena of American politics, only don't ascribe them to Democracy. It is better to deny, in spite of the notorious fact, that there is a large class of cultivated Americans, than to admit that they will not touch pitch for fear of defilement." And in truth, the comment does not seem to be unjust, for our apologist accounts for the low standard of our political leaders by referring to the small number of educated men, the inferior importance among us, of political as compared with private life, the influx of poor foreigners, in short, he makes it depend, as the reviewer phrases it, "upon anything in the world, except upon the leading, salient, notorious element of American institutions, democracy." Thus the difference between our advocate, and our bitter and scornful assailant goes no farther than this, that while the former sorrowfully admits all the evil that is said of us and of our society and politics, and seeks to show that these things have no necessary connection with our institutions, the latter holds "democracy" accountable for everything.

But our country finds in another of the essayists, Mr. Goldwin Smith, a less doubtful defender. "Equality, says Mr. Smith, has created in America a nation, great both in peace and war, wealthy, intelligent, united, capable of producing statesmen and soldiers, yet itself superior to its ablest men." And again: "A step, though only a step, has been made toward the realization of that ideal community, ordered and bound together by affection instead of force, the desire of which is in fact the spring of human progress." If this rose-colored picture is a little vague, it is certainly very pretty. But of course it awakens the ire and scorn of the Tory reviewer, who proceeds forthwith to demolish our kindly panegyrist, with as much ferocity as though he were implicated in the wickedness of the subject of his somewhat rhetorical laudation. Mr. Smith is, in the first place, sharply rebuked for having dared to speak of us as "a nation" at all. We are not a nation in any proper sense, but merely "a distracted aggregate of communities, trembling between central despotism and individual repulsion." It is equally absurd to speak of us as "great both in peace and war." We are not "great in peace," for we are "notoriously a prey to furious internal discord;" nor can we with any propriety be called "great in war," since the only "warfare on a great scale" that we have ever seen, is the "civil strife" from which we are "just bleeding." In regard to Mr. Smith's specification of "wealth," the reviewer intimates that he will suspend his verdict until he sees our currency at par; and as to the "intelligence" imputed to us, till he finds us intelligent enough to adopt "a commercial policy which does not violate every principle of economic science"—a hit, and not an undeserved one, at the short-sightedness and ignorance of well-settled laws of political economy that are evinced in our "protective" legislation. As to being "united," we are sneeringly told "the less said the better." But what more than all else provokes the wrath and derision of the critic, is "the audacity that talks of a community 'bound together by affection,' while one half of the States has its sword at the throat of the other half, and connects this state of things, however remotely, with the ideal of human progress."

But though Mr. Smith takes a highly favorable view, and in the main rather a rose colored one of the existing condition of things in the United States, and though he is very far from adopting Mr. Stephen's "confession and avoidance" style of advocacy, he is nevertheless compelled to make certain admissions to our disadvantage, which would seem, without explanation, to furnish an argument against our institutions. For instance, he admits "the want of taste and refinement in our politics," but thinks that is "not democratic, but colonial." He concedes the stupidity of our protective policy, but adds: "Protectionism is the vice, not of democracy, but of ignorance," to which the reviewer retorts: "But ignorance is itself the vice of a democracy." Proceeding to amplify and illustrate this brief but pregnant apothegm, he says: "Nobody ever supposed that democracies imposed prohibitive duties with a view to injure themselves; the complaint is, that the democratic government of America is so deplorably ignorant that after a question has been thoroughly sifted by reason and experience, and definitely settled in the forum of intelligence, it perseveres in a course of action demonstrably injurious to itself, and that from inability to grasp the argument, perhaps from utter ignorance that there is anything to say on the other side." Of Mr. Smith's "admissions," it may be said (which is not the case will all those so freely volunteered by Mr. Stephen) that they are such as the majority of well-informed Americans would join him in making, though they might not be always satisfied with his explanations. He is an ardent admirer of the theory of our government, and is even more sanguine in regard to its successful working in certain particulars, than many of our own public men. The Tory conviction in regard to us is, that we owe nothing of such prosperity as we have enjoyed, to the excellence of our institutions, but that on the contrary nothing could have saved us from being ruined by their inherent viciousness, but the extent of our territory, the cheapness and fertility of our lands, and the sparseness of our population. According to this view, our social and political condition is daily becoming worse, and must ultimately culminate in despotism or anarchy. Mr. Smith, on the other hand, thinks that most of the defects and evils the existence of which he admits, are the result of inexperience or ignorance, and that time will remove, instead of aggravating them. As we grow older, we shall become wiser in our legislation, more thoughtful in our politics, more amenable to reason and less controlled by prejudice and passion; our statesmen will learn to take broader views, the influence of the better instructed will prevail in the community, and the people will be less subject to the dominion of demagogues. Let us trust that our English admirers, of the schools of Mr. Smith and Professor Cairnes, and Mr. Frederick Harrison, are not too sanguine in indulging these cheering anticipations concerning us, and that the future will falsify the sinister auguries of those who believe that the inevitable progress of democracy is a steady march to social and political ruin meantime it is well to remember that more is to be learned from the searching criticism of enemies, than from the laudations of admiring friends, and that it is a weakness unworthy of a reasoning being to allow such criticism to excite in us either childish irritation or boorish passion.

NEGRO INDUSTRY.

THE investigations which have been caused by the negro outbreak at Morant Bay, in October, 1865, and by the embittered controversy that has ever since been raging in England between those who condemn, and those who attempt to justify the course of Governor Eyre in suppressing said outbreak, have resulted in throwing much new light upon the condition of the negroes in Jamaica since the emancipation, and upon a number of vexing questions in regard to their willingness to labor for wages, their obedience to law, and their general fitness for freedom and the exercise of civil and political rights.

Besides the report of the "Jamaica Royal Commission," appointed to examine into all matters connected with the outbreak and its suppression, quite a number of books and pamphlets have been written by persons who have enjoyed exceptional opportunities for becoming acquainted with the subject. The titles of five of these books are prefixed to an article in the July number of the Westminister Review, entitled, "Jamaica," and whatever knowledge we possess of their character and contents, is derived from the extracts quoted in the article referred to. It seems that previous to the abolition of the slave trade, in 1802, the planters of Jamaica were able to supply themselves with slaves from Africa at so small a cost, that the most profitable way of working them was to require the utmost possible amount of work from them regardless of the unnatural severity of the labor, and of its effects upon the nigger. Under this system, seven years was the average of the negro's life. The planter found it the most economical course to "use them up," and buy a fresh lot. After the abolition of slavery in the island, the planters were loud in their complaints of the "laziness" of the negroes and in their assertions that the necessary amount of labor could not be procured. But the testimony of all candid and disinterested witnesses goes to show that in Jamaica, after the establishment of the free labor system, the planters had no reason to complain in these respects, and that the negroes were ready and willing to work for fair wages promptly paid. The difficulty was, that the landed proprietors had been unfitted by their habits as slave-owners, for the management of hired laborers. In proof of this, we think it will be sufficient to cite the testimony of Messrs. Harvey and Brewin, two gentlemen who were deputed in 1866, by the Society of Friends in England, to visit Jamaica and obtain information as to the actual condition of the negroes. These gentlemen say in their report, that "the most important comment on the local administration of justice in the island is supplied by the fact that the laborers (the negroes) have ceased to appeal to the courts for redress in any dispute about work or wages, and almost in any case whatever between them and the class above them." The Commissioners further report that, "it was shown before the royal commission that it would be a sheer waste of time for a laborer to prosecute any such case, since the magistrates would put him off from court to court, would adjourn the court, or prevent the formation of a quorum, and so defeat any complaint against one of themselves or of their friends." It is possible, that the books from which the testimony to which we refer is derived, were written by persons whose sympathies with the negro have unduly affected their judgment. But if they are to be accepted as honest and trustworthy witnesses, it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that the greater part of the sins charged against the blacks of Jamaica, are the natural result of the treatment they have received at the hands of the whites.

IT IS said that the Sacramento Union has made arrangements to import an editor from New York to supply the place of the late Mr. Watson. With a very high appreciation of Mr. Watson's great talent, we must nevertheless say, that his place seems to have been well filled for some time past. His successor, though less accomplished as a rhetorician, and a less brilliant writer, is fully equal to him in real ability, and much superior in the treatment of all subjects of a practical character. The Union never published an abler article than the one entitled "An Independent Party," which appeared in its columns some week or ten days since. With the exception of the lamented Tuttle, we have never known a case in which an "imported editor" has proved a distinguished success in Californian journalism.

MR. GEO. WILKES, of the New York Spirit, is particularly savage on President Johnson. In a recent issue of his paper he says: "Public affairs grow more and more disgusting. It is little to say that while the President remains in office, we are to have no peace, but only plots and counterplots, the morning manœuvre and the evening imbroglio. While we can bear passions and prejudices and mistakes, we become sick of mean and mousing methods—of the tremulousness irresolution of Macbeth without his intervals of compensating courage. There is a choice of ways, even in the perpetration of bad actions, and if there be one especially miry and crooked, the President is sure to find it out and follow it.

THE Paris Exposition will be closed on the 31st of October.

He stood before her in silence for several moments: then through the distant music she heard his voice.

"She said I should see nothing," he said abruptly. "She was wrong. Shall I tell you what I have seen?"

His eyes were directed toward her, but he did not wait for her to speak. Before she could reply he spoke again.

"She told me tell her about ruined cities. There are other ruins besides fallen stones. One such," and his voice sank into infinite tenderness, "I have seen to-night—a temple that I left entire, fresh from God's hand."

She rose up suddenly from her seat and stood before him with her slight figure erect, and with all that she had in her of gentle pride gathered upon her face.

"My white face does me wrong to-night," she said. "I am no ruin. I have known sorrow, as others have; but no sorrow I have felt has crushed me. I have grown to look old, perhaps; but I am not young now, even in years."

His dark face for a moment had thrown off its mask, but all tenderness that in word or look had begun to appear in him shrank back before her words. The pause that came when she ceased to speak was broken by this cold reply—

"If there has been no suffering then my petition may be granted more easily. I have come a long way," he said slowly, "to ask forgiveness for a wrong done to you long ago." He paused for a moment, and then his voice grew bitter as he ended. "It will cost you little to grant it. When the pain of a wrong has ceased, we can can forgive the wronger easily."

She had been very calm outwardly when she had spoken, but now her hands were crushed together, and her eyes, fixed on his face, were troubled and dark. She stood one moment shrivering, then all her love rose in a wild defence, and out of that nine years' silence leapt this cry—

"It has not ceased. O, the pain has not ceased!"

Her head fell down upon her parted hands, she hid her face upon them, and broke with passionate helplessness into a low piteous sob.

And then, as she stood there desolate, she felt his arm circling her round; and passionate once more, in its deep loving tenderness, she heard his voice—

"Magaret, I have been faithful," he cried. "In spite of that harsh wrong I have lived for you. I have worked for you. I came to pray for more than forgivenesss. I came to pray for my reward."

It was far away, that English village by the old familiar sea, yet, before his tones had died away, how there flashed back on her a picture of it, clearer than the sight of tropic land. She lifted up her eyes—the passionate gaze of old was on her face; she raised her arms—they fell to their old place upon his neck; she spoke to him.

Long years ago he had told her to wait for him till he came back. Like a child delivering up its trust, she whispered—

"I have waited!"

That was all. From him there only came one passionate low utterance of her name. Then between them there was perfect silence, and they stood beneath the tropic trees as they stood nine years before under the sea-cliff at Brent.

Political Conventions sometimes present stormy scenes, but the convention of spiritualists recently convened at Cleveland, Ohio, seems to have been composed of more discordant and explosive materials than any political one on record. The politicians generally manage, after more or less wrangling, to agree upon a platform of some sort. But the spiritualists were unable to agree in anything, and so they broke up in something very like a row. One chief cause of the disturbance seems to have been the bringing in of a report by a committee of leading members, to whom the subject had been referred, exposing the imposture of the whole class of "rope-tying" and "dark-cabinet" mediums, and recommending that they should not be recognized as in good standing in the table-tipping communion. We do not see clearly how the rope-tying and dark-cabinet branches of the business differ in principle from the spirit-painting, spirit-flower-making, and other departments, or how the one is more likely to be an imposture than the others.

A California Vine.—A gentleman writing from Santa Barbara, in the southern part of this State, gives the following description of a grapo vine in the locality, said to he the largest in the world, planted forty years ago by a Spanish woman: "The vine four and a half feet from the ground is one foot in diameter, or a little more than three feet around it; then it bulges out for a foot and a half higher and much larger. At that height it branches out, and the branches are supported by scaffoldings, so that I could walk upright under it with my hat on. The branches spread over an area of from one thousand to twelvo hundred feet. The annual crop of grapes from this vine average four tons, and has been as high as six tons; only think of it, from eight to twelve thousand pounds of grape on a singlo vine. It looks almost incredible, but it is a veritable fact."

A talkative man neither hears nor is heard, He won't listen to others, nor they to him.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE rush to witness the performances of Dan Bryant, the Irish Comedian, at Maguire's Opera House, has continued unabated throughout the week. Every night the theatre has been thronged by an audience ever ready to applaud on the slightest provocation, and to laugh at the mildest joke. Among the new performances given, Rory O'Moore, More Blunders than One, Ireland as it Was, and The Colleen Bawn may be mentioned. At the matinee to-day the Colleen Bawn will he played, and the evening's entertainment will consist of Ireland as it Was and Barney the Baron.

The great Ha-yah-takee troupe have during the present week surpassed all their former performances. Each night there has been a change of scenery, acts and performers. The tree feat is the most wonderful balancing act ever performed. To-night this wonderful troupe give their last performance, on which occasion they will perform their most astounding feats. A matinee will he given to-day, when young California will be shown that a little Japanese boy, of five years old, is capable of performing feats which would require many years of practice from our most experienced gymnasts.

On Monday evening, Miss Emma Howson, whose talent as a lyric artiste, has rendered her so popular with the public of San Francisco, will be the recipient of a complimentary benefit. The public like a little change; they have had tragedy, spectacular plays, Irish comedy, and Japanese gymnastics; it is some time since they were favored with English Opera; setting aside the merit of the beneficiary, it may safely he prophesied that a large audience will assemble on Monday night in the Metropolitan Theatre, to listen to the delightful opera of Maritana, which will he presented with a full chorus and orchestra. On Monday, Alexander Fitzgerald, who, in consequence of the prolonged run of True to the Core and the arrival of the Japanese, has had hut little opportunity of distinguishing himself, will take his first benefit, and appear in Othello. On Wednesday evening, Andrew Torning, the scenic artist, actor and manager, who has for so many years been identified with the progress of the drama on the Pacific coast, will take a farewell benefit previons to leaving for Australasia.

On Monday evening, Stephen Masset, sometimes "Jeems Pipes, of Pipesville," will receive a complimentary benefit at Platt's Hall, previous to his departure for Japan and China. Mr. Massett's entertainment is a varied one, consisting of songs, recitations and imitations, and has been received with much favor in the principal cities of the Eastern States.

On Monday, October 14th, the Occidental Theatrical Association, under the management of Geo. M. Ciprico, the professor of elocution at the Russ House, will give one of their pleasant entertainments at Turn Verein Hall. The dramatic portion of the entertainment will consist of the drama of Don Cæser de Bazan, in which Mr. Ciprico will enact the title role. A social dance will terminate the evening's entertainment.

Touchstone.

Mark Twain's English Reviewers.—Mark Twain's book is thus spoken of by that most critical of the London Reviews, the Saturday Review:

"'The Celebrated Jumping Frog' and its companion may be recommended to any one who is capable of appreciating humor, or enjoying a good laugh. There are not many of these sketches which could be read by the most confirmed hypochondriacs with an unmoved countenace; and not one of them which might not be read aloud, without missing a word, by the most fastidious mother to a family circle."

We are glad that this collection of sketches, most of which appeared originally in the Californian, have been endorsed by such high authority; we are especially pleased that the Saturday Review does not side with the "prurient prudes" who have charged Mark Twain with coarseness.

City Gardens.—To-day, a grand instrumental concert will be given at these popular pleasure grounds, and to-morrow a fine programme of sacred music will he performed. The concerts hitherto given, have been of a high order and merit. The zoological collection has had several additions made to it, including that of an American lion.

Woodward's Gardens.—An important addition to the already large collection of animals on exhibition in these gardens, was made this week, in the shape of a large South American tiger, one of the most beautiful and graceful members of the cat family. A fine concert will he given to-morrow. These gardens are now in fine order, and the public should enjoy them as much as possible before the rainy season sets in.

San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board.—We have received from the publishers, John H. Carmany & Co., proprietors of the Weekly Stock Circular, a neatly executed diagram of the San Francisco Stock and Exchange Board. The occupant of each desk is designated by name, a list of all members of the board and their addresses, and the scale of commissions are given, and the publication is one likely to be very serviceable to those who have business with the Board.

THE MUSICAL MONTHLY.

On Tuesday, October 1st, the first number of a periodical entitled, The Musical Monthly, made its appearance. M. Gray, the music dealer, at 609 and 613 Clay street, is the publisher. The typographical portion of the work is neatly executed by Towne & Bacon. No. 1 reflects credit on the taste of the editor, the selections made from various musical papers being fresh and well chosen. The original criticisms on local musical events, though not very extended, are well written. The following, which we horrow from the columns of this paper, will interest many who listened with delight to the performances of Paul Julien.

We find in the Courrier de San Francisco, a letter of Gottschalk's, quoted from the L'Art Musical of Paris, and part of which we translate. The letter is dated at Montevideo, the 25th May last:

"Yesterday morning they performed a service for the repose of the soul of poor Paul Julien, who died in Mauritius, last January. His widow has come hack here (she had been married in Montevideo a year before) with her child, a little girl but a few months old. The news of his death, which I heard of by a singular chance, at the moment of landing here, and when the funeral service was just closing, has greatly affected me,

"I knew poor Julien, when, hardly ten years old, he arrived at Paris, and entering the Conservatoire hy storm, carried off, at the end of six months, the first prize for violin-playing; and his memory had always remained with me. It was twelve years since I had seen him for the last time, a bright-faced lively boy, who astonished and delighted us all, with his amazing talent, and his childish enthusiasm.

"It was with difficulty, therefore, that I recognized in the fine, manly head of a portrait published at San Francisco, the features of the boy-genius who, when but ten years old, already promised to add another master to the French school.

"Alas! it is hnt a few years since we promised each other, then widely separated, to meet once more in Paris. * *

"L. M. Gottschalk."

The fourth and fifth pages of The Musical Monthly are devoted to one of J. L. Hutton's sweet songs entitled "Good Morning Sweet to Thee."

H. Bancroft & Co., 1867.

The Pacific Musical Gazette.—No. 6, of the Pacific Musical Gazette, duly made its appearance on the first of October. The month of September was rather a dull one in the musical world, and presented but few local events worthy of comment. Four pages of music are included in the present number, the compositions given comprise Henry Harding's beautiful motette, "I Will Lift Up Mine Eyes." The "leader" in this number is a powerfully written article against the Philistinism" which exists in San Francisco. The text for an earnest sermon against Philistines is thus expressed:

"Our esteemed contemporary, the Californian, recently contained an article on the Philistinism of San Francisco. Carlisle and Matthew Arnold are quoted, as defining the term "Philistines" to be a class of people who have "little sympathy with culture, except in its directly practical hearings;" who reverence only wealth and success; who are devoted to material interests; and who are lavish in expenditure for objects which minster to the grosser tastes, hut begrudge the cost of a work of art; who never haggle about the price of wines or cigars, but beat down their children's music teacher."

The editor goes right to the point and in an earnest, prayerful, almost tearful manner, he exhorts the Philistines who "never haggle about the price of wines and cigars, hut beat down their children's music teacher, to strive to become civilized by degrees, and calls upon them to aid in the formation of musical societies which shall have the effect of purifying our musical atmosphere.

My Mexican Mines, is the title of a very clever and readable sketch by Charles Henry Webb, which will be found on the first page of our present issue.

THE GUERDON.

Alain, the poet, fell asleep one day
In the lord's chamber, when it chanced the queen,
With her twelve maids of honor, passed that way—
She, like a slim white lily set between Twelve glossy leaves, for they were robed in green.

A forest of gold pillars propped the roof,
And from the heavy corbels of carved stone
Yawned drowsy dwarfs, with satyrs' face and hoof;
Like one of those brave pillars overthrown,
The slanted sunlight through the casement shown,

Gleaming across the body of Alain—
As if the airy column in its fall
Had caught and crushed him. So the laughing train
Came on him suddenly, and one and all
Drew back, affrighted, midway in the hall.

Like some huge beetle curled up in the sun
Was the man lying in the noontide glare,
Deformed and hideous to look upon,
With sunken eyes and masses of coarse hair,
And sallow cheeks deep seamed with time and care.

Forth from her maidens stood Queen Margaret;
The royal blood up to her temples crept
Like a wild vine with faint red roses set,
As she across the pillared chamber swept,
And, kneeling, kissed the poet while he slept.

Then from her knees uprose the stately queen,
And, seeing her ladies titter, 'gan to frown
With those great eyes, wherein methinks were seen
Lights that outflashed the lustres in her own—
Great eyes that looked the shallow women down.

'Nay, not for love"—'twas like a sudden bliss,
The full sweet measured music of her tongue;
"Nay, not for love's sake did I give the kiss,
Not for his beauty, who's not fair nor young,
But for the songs which those mute lips have sung."

LADY JOAN'S VOW.

BY I. D. FENTON.

What can a young lassie, what will a young lassie—
What can a young lassie wi' an auld man?

In spite of this assertion, many a "young lassie" has been well content to marry an "auld man;" provided always there has been plenty of tocher on the right side. So it was that Samuel Baldwin, Knight, and sojourner in the parish of Lymington, did, in the year of grace, 1730, find a young and beautiful bride. Tradition passes over the history of their married life in ominous silence. Suffice it, that when Sir Samuel died there was found a curious paper, stating it to be his will and pleasure that his body should be carried out to Scratchells Bay, and there sunk. "In order," the document went on to say, "that my wife, Joan, may not be able to dance upon my grave, which, in the bitterness of her wrath, she has vowed to do."

In obedience to this singular command, the worthy knight's body was duly weighted and left to rest under the shadow of the Needles; while the young widow took entire possession of the dead man's property, no one disputing the will which she produced.

Now the Lady Joan Baldwin looked marvelously fair in her weeds; and, although it is of no use gilding pure gold, every day experience proves there are exceptions to the rule; therefore, fair as the widow was, the gilding derived from the funds made her doubly fair, and brought to her feet the greedy, the needy, the rich, the poor. Time went on, and to the disappointment of the gossiping world Lady Joan seemed in no haste to change her condition, but the rather to aim at universal conquest. The ladies grew not only scandalous but wrath, for so equally were Joan's favors distributed that every man secretly considered himself the most fortunate, and thus, there being no rejected suitors, there were no deserters, and the wrathful indignation of the neglected sisterhood was the more excusable. Things went on after this fashion until a hunting meeting came off. Lyndhurst was full of great noblemen. The Lady Joan was the toast at many a wild carouse. The hunt lasted for several days, and when the festivities were at a hight, an event occurred that put the place on the qui vive.

At the close of a long and successful day in the forest, a stranger rode home at the widow's bridle-hand.

"Some Lymington fellow," said the Londoners.

"Some court roué," said the Lymington folk.

Yet, though unknown to the lady's jealous followers, the stranger was evidently not only on good, but familiar, terms with the widow; who, in place of remaining the night at Lyndhurst, rode on to Lymington, escorted by the new arrival. Next day, there was a rage and amazement in many a heart. Lymington church bells clanged a joyous wedding peal. The widow had outwitted them.

Disappointed suitors let loose their tongues, and out of very spite hunted up the fact that the man who had outdone them all and carried off the prize, was an old lover, to whom, before she was "my lady," Joan Armitage had plighted her troth, and who, they asserted, had remained in the neighborhood disguised as a forester, nothing loth to wait for the knight's well-tochered widow. Nor was this all: darker stories were whispered, and at last it was even hinted that the knight had met his death unfairly, and that the settlement and will by which the widow claimed her great wealth was forged by the mysterious lover. Joan heard of these things, and only laughed. "I married for money once, I can marry for love this time." Yet in spite of the boasted love, and the constant presence of the man she had chosen, a great change became visible: the bright color faded out of her cheeks; her eyes grew sunken and dim; her laugh hushed: life and energy seemed to be fading away. The bridegroom, too, was a changed man; he became silent and morose; scarcely ever left his wife's side; and watched her with a pertinacity which the lookers on called jealousy. Some said Lady Joan was conscience smitten; some said her husband ill-treated her; both reports were as far from the truth as such generally are. It was only to a chosen friend that the unhappy man unbosomed himself.

"Night after night," he said, "I wake and behold her place vacant. Night after night I have endeavored to remain awake, that I might unravel the mystery; but in vain. I invariably fall asleep, and when morning comes Joan is lying by my side, and were it not that her face is pale and haggard, and her feet cut and travel-stained, I could believe I had been dreaming."

"You have questioned the Lady Joan, of course?" said his friend.

"Not a word, Dick."

"Then, why not watch her?"

"Ay, that is it! I want you to help me. Do you consent to lie in wait this very night, and we will follow her?"

So it was arranged. Dick Berkeley was waiting in the street, when, shortly after the church tolled twelve, the house door opened, and the Lady Joan, clad only in her white night-dress, tripped down the steps. Dick had always been an admirer of the ladies; but he stood amazed exceedingly as he caught sight of her beautiful face, lighted up with a gleam he had never seen before; her long hair flouting, Godiva like, in the wind, her fair arms stretched over her head, and her clasped hands seemingly wrung together in agony. There was something so extraordinary in the circumstances attaching to the lady—something so wild and passionate in her attitude and expression—that Dick's heart was stricken, and although he hesitated for a moment, he did not lose sight of her. He had pledged his word to follow her, and so he went, keeping close behind her as she walked down the High street, and through the ill-paved by-lanes, leading to the so-called quay As she approached, a small boat, with one boatman, glided up the river, and as it grated against the steps, Lady Joan stepped in.

"Quick, quick!" whispered her husband, who had come up with Dick a little while before. "Follow her to the devil!"

Dick shuddered, but unfastened a boat, and they were soon in pursuit.

"Not too near," said Dick, lying on his oars; for the husband, beside himself with jealous fury, was gaining upon the little boat. "Not too near, I say, or they will suspect us; they are making for the castle."

He was wrong, however; they passed Hurst Castle, and steered straight across the Solent; rounded the Needles, and turned into Scratchells Bay. Here, those who followed, saw a fearful sight.

The water was as smooth as glass, but bright with a lurid, weird-like flame; and upon it danced the Lady Joan, filling the air with her shrieks, while all the time, round and round, sliding, curtesying, bounding, she performed her ghastly minuet.

An hour, which seemed an age to the lookers on, passed. Held by some strange power, they still sat, watching with staring eyes, and curdling blood, until the white figure was taken back into the boat, and rowed to shore again.

Not one word passed between the friends; but next day Joan's husband set off on a journey to London, where he meant to lay the mysterious case before eminent doctors, both spiritual and physical, in the hope of obtaining a release from his devil-possessed wife.

Not so Dick Berkeley. That love is capricious, and, moreover, covers a multitude of sins, we all know. The glamor was over poor Dick, who was so passionately enamored of Lady Joan, that he even envied the devil the pleasure of ferrying her to her nightly task; and Lady Joan, who had grown weary of the evil tempter, and surveillance of her husband, proved herself nothing loth to accept Dick's homage. And Dick, finding the lady willing, and the coast clear, made such use of his time that in a week from her husband's departure, Joan had consented to elope with her new lover, and carry off with them all the wealth she could bring to account.

They embarked in a French sloop, the captain of which agreed to take them to Cherbourgh; but as ill-luck would have it, the ship was becalmed just beyond the Needles, in the haunted Scratchells Bay.

"I'll be able to keep my vow at last," laughed Lady Joan. "Sir Samuel was buried here; if there is a fiddler among the crew he shall come up, and I shall dance over the old wretch's grave in spite of his queer will."

There was no fiddler; and Dick, who, ever since the wind had fallen so suddenly and left them in the fatal Bay, had been getting more and more frightened, managed to persuade Joan that such an action would be folly, and soon forgot the horrors of the past in the happiness of the present.

At midnight, Dick, who was still awake, saw his mistress rise. He rose too; and following her on deck, perceived the same scene and horror he had witnessed before; and as he leaned against the bullwark, the devil prompting him, he thought, "Why not leave her here, and carry of the riches she had robbed the old man of."

No sooner said than done. The breeze, which seemed to be waiting for his wish, sprang up; the sails filled, and the sloop began to move through the glancing water. But only for a second; the heavens grew black; thunder pealed; and a fiery bolt rushing down from the angry clouds, split the ship in two.

Dick found himself floating upon the waves, clinging frantically to a broken mast, not another vestige of the wreck was visible. But there, pirouetting, with streaming hair and gasping lips, Lady Joan danced her death dance.

Dick was sorry for her now, and called to her in his own despair and agony; but she heeded him not. As a long, red streak away in the west told of coming day, the shrieks grew wilder and the dance more furious. Higher spread the rosy dawn, until the Needles caught the reflection, and reared themselves like a blood stained hand. Dick tried to shut his ears; but the frantic shrieks would not be drowned. One, at last, came wilder and more horrible than all. The white figure disappeared beneath the waves, now glowing like fire, and the unhappy man was left clinging to the spar, alone upon the wide waters.

Hours after he was picked up by a passing ship, and carried to Ireland, from whence he wrote, detailing the circumstances, and announcing his intention of taking holy orders, wherefrom he hoped to obtain absolution and relief.

* * * * * * * *

Such is the Legend of Scratchells Bay; and although I never could succeed in seeing the phantom-dance of the Lady Joan, the old boatman, who gave me the history of her fate, assured me that when he was fishing off the Bay, he saw her; and was so frightened that he drank a whole bottle of rum, and found himself in the morning drifting nearly to Southampton water. I fancy my friend was of the poet's opinion, and might have justly said—

Truth, they say, lies in a well,
Why, I vow, I never could see;
Let the water drinkers tell—
There it always lay for me.

Youth.—Youth is the time of enterprise and hope; having yet no occasion of comparing our force with any opposing power, we naturally form presumptions in our favor, and imagine that obstruction and impediment will give way before us. The first impulses rather inflame vehemence than teach prudence; a brave and generous mind is long before it suspects its own weakness, or submits to sup the difficulties which it expected to subdue by storm. Before disappointments have enforced the dictates of philosophy, we believe it in our power to shorten the interval between the first cause and the last effect; we laugh at the timorous delays of brooding industry, and fancy by increasing the fire we can, at pleasure, accelerate the motion.

Feather Pillows.—If a person sleeps upon the back, no pillow is needed. If one sleeps upon the side, a pillow should be used thick enough to support the head in a direct line with the body. No more. Curled hair is one of the best materials for pillows. Feathers should never be allowed about a bed in any form. For pillows they are especially injurious, as they partly surround the head and keep it overheated, which weakens the scalp and produces a tendency to falling out of the hair, congestion of the head and headache. Then again, the effete emanation that are always being thrown off from feathers are taken directly into the lungs with the inspired air.

Rules for Hard Times.—Stop grumbling. Get up two hours earlier in the morning, and begin to do something out of your regular profession. Mind your own business, and with all your might, let other people's alone. Live within your means. Sell your horses. Give away, sell or kill your dog. Eat with moderation and go to bed early. Talk less of your peculiar gifts and virtues, and more of your friends and neighbors. Be cheerful. Fulfill your promises. Pay your debts. Be yourself all you would see in others. Be a good man and stop grumbling.

It is impossible to make people understand their ignorance, for it requires knowledge to perceive it; and, therefore, he that can perceive it hath it not.

Were but human beings always that which they are in their best moments, then should we know here already on earth a kingdom of heaven, of beauty and goodness.

To mourn for the dead is to mourn for the lost casket when you still retain the jewel it held. The memories of the dead one's virtues are the jewel, and cold clay but the casket.

BABBITTONIAN,
OR SELF-TEACHING
PENMANSHIP

The System of Babbitonian Penmanship is pre-eminently self-instructing. With its ample explanations of right and wrong forms—its sixty wood cuts—its plain intelligent rules, one may sit down by his own fireside and become a finer Penman than he could at much greater cost in the usual way with a living teacher.

There is a great demand for fine Penmen in the commercial world, and this system, at a trifling expense, imparts a skilful command of the Pen, worth hundreds of dollars to the fortunate possessor.

Penmanship is an indispensable accomplishment to Ladies, and this system is elaborate in a series of elegant copies in the Ladies' Style.

Business men have sometimes lost thousands of Dollars from ignorance in regard to Business forms, and there is furnished in a set, without additional charge, a fine variety of Business Forms and Abbreviations. To sum up the Excellencies of this System, it is—

1—Scientific in its Arrangement of Principles;
2—Artistic in its Movements and Flourishes;
3—Practical in its Combinations and Applications;
4—Stylish in its neat and chaste Gracefulness;
5—Superior for Legibility, Rapidity and Beauty;
6—Most Disciplinary for fingers, Arms and Muscles.
7—Unexcelled for Comprehensiveness and Simplicity.
8—Complete and Self-Teaching for Private Learners;
9—Time, Labor and Expense Saving for Pupils and Teachers.

The Babbitonian Penmanship

Is published on durable card-board slips, ninety-two copies illustrated, put up in a neat package with a Chart, the whole complete at the low price of $1 50.

Babbittonian Pens.

One reason why the country is flooded with poor Pens is that they are generally made by mechanics, rather than by artistic and experienced Penmen, the only parties really understanding the requirements of a good article.

The Babbittonian Pens,

Made in the most finished style, by skilful artisans, after models prepared according to the combined wisdom and experience of several amateurs and old Professors of Penmanship, are admirably adapted to meet the public wants.

The Babbittonian Ladies' Pen,

Is one of the most exquisite little instruments for delicate writing ever constructed.

The Babbittonian Extra Fine Pen,

Is pronounced by a large number of Penmen to be more free, more durable, and more varied in capacity for either fine or coarse strokes than any foreign Pen whatever. Suitable for elegant writing, it is a great favorite with the ladies and gentlemen.

The Babbittonian Business Pen,

Having great freedom and variety of movement, is unequaled for general business or school purposes. Somewhat coarser than the Extra Fine, it wears longer and moves more easily on paper.

☞ This Pen is now in use in the large counting-houses and banks in this city.

PROFITABLE INVESTMENT.—For small depositors, or for young men who are inclined to save their money instead of spending it unwisely, says the Boston Transcript, no better or more secure investment can be made than in a savings bank. We have seen to-day a bank book containing a deposit made in 1836 of twenty dollars, and to its credit stands $139 05, nearly seven times the original amount. The interest is about 19 per cent. per year. The investment has remained undisturbed since it was first made.

RECIPE FOR A PLAY.—Take an old Gothic castle and place in it a virtuous dairymaid and marry her sister, a libertine lord, a villainous tool, and a very comic servant. Mix them well, season them with a spice murder, and let them simmer gently for half an hour. Then introduce a heavy father, with virtuous top-boots and a homely waist-coat. Stir up well with a row, and bring in a hero at the end who was supposed to be dead, but who eventually proves to be the rightful heir to the estate. Pair off in couples and serve up married.

AMONG the dogs exhibited at the Ile de Bilancourt was a beautiful little King Charles, weighing some twenty ounces. This little bijou was purchased by M'lle Cora Pearl for 2,200 francs, a large sum for so small a puppy, though, after all, but a trifle to la grande lione.

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL

ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner property worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.

BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Ontside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Grecley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say: "It is, therefore, now the settled law that the municipal lands held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."

Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.

SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

I LOVE to look on a scene like this
Of wild and careless play,
And persuade myself that I am not old
And my locks are not yet gray;
For it stirs the blood of the old man's heart
And makes his pulses fly,
To catch the thrill of a happy voice
And the light of a pleasant eye.

I have walked the world for four-score years,
And they say that I am old—
That my heart is ready for the reaper Death,
And my years are well nigh told.
It is very true—it is very true—
I am old and I "bide my time;"
But my heart will leap at a scene like this,
And I half renew my prime.

Play on! play on! I'm with you there
In the midst of your merry ring;
I can feel the thrill of the daring jump,
And the rush of the breathless swing;
I hide with you in the fragrant hay,
And I whoop the smothered call,
And my feet slip on the sceedy floor,
And I care not for the fall.

I am willing to die when my time shall come.
And I shall be glad to go—
For the world, at best, is a weary place,
And my pulse is getting low;
But the grave is dark, and the heart will fail
In treading its gloomy way;
And it wiles my heart from its dreariness
To see the young so gay.

A PET LION.—A gentleman, visiting a house in Algeria, says: "In a few minutes a door opened and a lion entered the room, the man only leading him by the tuft of his mane. He was a magnificent animal, two years old, and full grown, all but his mane, which, although but a foot long, made, however, a respectable appearance. He did not seem to care about our being strangers, but wandering about the room like a large dog, permitted us to take liberties with him, such as patting him, shaking a paw, and making him exhibit his teeth and claws. He showed a marked predilection in favor of old acquaintances, and lying down before them, turning on his back to be scratched. After a scratch or two he began to yawn, and was fairly settling himself for a nap, when a cigar was puffed in his face, a proceeding he evidently did not approve of. Rising in a hurry, curling his lips and wrinkling his nose, he exposed to view a splendid set of teeth, a sure sign that he was not pleased. A hearty sneeze seemed to restore him to good temper, and bearing no malice, he returned a friendly pat bestowed on him by Capt. Martenot, who had been the aggressor, by rubbing his head caressingly against his knee."

AN INGENIOUS DEVICE OF THE INDIANS.—It is said the Indians on the Plains have an ingenious way of setting fire to houses with their arrows. They wrap with a rag some powder on the heads of their arrows, and on the tip of their arrow-head place a percussion-cap. When the arrow strikes the object to be fired, the cap is exploded and the powder and rag ignited. The rag burns long enough to set any combustible with which it may come in contact on fire.

NOTICE IS HEREBY GIVEN, THAT IN PURSUANCE of an order of the Probate Court of the City and County of San Francisco, made on the 27th day of August, 1867, the undersigned the Administrator of the estate of JOHN THOMAS, deceased, will sell at public auction, to the highest bidder for cash, in United States gold coin, in one parcel and subject to confirmation by said Probate Court, on WEDNESDAY, the 9th day of October, 1867, at 12 o'clock, noon, at the auction rooms of MAURICE DORE & CO., No. 327 Montgomery street, in said City and County of San Francisco, all the right, title, interest and estate of the said John Thomas, deceased, at the time of his death, and all the right, title and interest that the said estate has by operation of law or otherwise acquired other than, or in addition to that of said John Thomas, at the time of his death, in and to all the real estate described below, with the improvements and appurtenances thereon.

TERMS OF SALE—Cash in United States gold coin. Ten per cent. of the purchase money to be paid to the auctioneer at the time of sale; balance on confirmation by the Probate Court. Deeds and Revenue Stamps at the expense of purchaser.

The following is the property to be sold:

That certain piece or parcel of land lying and being in the City and County of San Francisco, State of California, bounded and described as follows, to wit:

Commencing at the angle of intersection of the north line of Fell street, with the east line of a fence now or late owned by John Ferguson, and running thence northeasterly along said line of fence seventy (70) feet; thence easterly and parallel with Fell street fifty (50) feet; thence south-westerly and parallel with said fence seventy (70) feet to Fell street; thence westerly along the northerly line of Fell street fifty (50) feet to the point of commencement, being a part of block No. 299 on the official map of said City and County.

Dated September 13th, 1867.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

MARY ANN LEEDOM, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days; or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant, awarding the care and custody of her daughter Julia to plaintiff, and allowing her to resume her maiden name.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

It is ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of the said James Conlon, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the City and County of San Francisco, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall, in said City and County, on MONDAY, the twenty eighth day of October, A. D., 1867, at 11 o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the heirs of the said James Conlon, deceased, according to law.

It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks before the said twenty-eighth day of October, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Dated September 21st, A. D. 1867.

THE DEW OF EDEN.
LADIES OF CALIFORNIA?—If you will keep your complexions in the freshness, delicacy and beauty of youth, you must use the DEW OF EDEN, for it is the only article extant that will do for those using it all that it purports without injury, as it contains no mineral or poisonous substances whatever. It preserves the skin from the effects of climate and atmospheric changes; prevents the formation of Freckles, Tan, Morphew, Sunburn and Wrinkles. It keeps the skin soft, tender and beautiful; because it is congenial and natural to it, and composed of ingredients that supply to it what time and exposure take too rapidly away. It preserves and restores. It is valuable to the young, but more so to those from whom the stern hand of Time is stealing the treasures of youth; to such, it will actually arrest its depredations and avert its ravages upon the human face divine. It will surely smooth out those lines of care to a great extent, and restore the skin to comparative youth. Used on the hands daily, it preserves them in all fineness of texture and delicacy of early years. It gives a beautiful tint to the nails of the fingers, and keeps them tender and soft. It is not a cosmetic, and must not be used with any kind of paint. A simple powder, however, of harmless nature, may be used without detriment with this protective.
No lady once using the DEW OF EDEN will ever afterward dispense with it from her toilet.

MARY.

BY CHARLES SWAIN.

The graceful and the beautiful,
The gentle, kind, and airy,
Together met to mould the form
And gift the mind of Mary;
There's nature in each careless curl,
In every grace a moral;
Her mouth—'tis Cupid's mouth—sweet girl,
And full of pearls and coral!

She's like the key-stone to an arch
That consummates all beauty;
She's like the music to a march,
Which sheds a joy on duty!
All happy thoughts and feelings rife
Seem evermore to guide her;
The very ills and cares of life
Forget themselves beside her!

Each sweet expressive glance appears
Of nature's best selection:
It took the world six thousand years
To perfect such perfection!
All gifts divine that could combine
All charms of nymph or fairy,
Agreed to grace one beauteous face,
And witch the world with Mary!

She speeds as if with wings, so fleet
No birds could e'er surpass them,
Yet none can ever spy her feet,
Though 'tis believed she has them!
She lends a spell to every scene,
Her step makes winter venal;
A something half divine, between
The earthly and eternal!

EARLY MARRIAGES IN DAMASCUS.—We were not permitted to depart without seeing the ladies of the house, and accepting the invariable Eastern hospitalities. Attending the venerable mother, entered a young girl of about fourteen, small and delicate form and feature, and exceedingly pretty. Her black hair was plaited in broad braids that were long enough to reach the shoulders, about which the ends were left to fall in soft fringes. Her wide Turkish trousers were of rose-colored silk; the sleeves of her embroidered jacket fell away loosely from a white arm; a little jaunty Greek cap surmounted the glossy braids, the silken tassel reaching to the silky fringes of her hair. She did not take her seat, English fashion, with the mother, on the divan, as is sometimes done by way of courtesy to the guest, but dropped á la Turk, on the cushions near our feet. While we saying to ourselves, "What a sweet child this is!" and wondering whether she would ever develop the affections of young ladyhood, the old man spoke of her as being the wife of his son, and said they had been married three years. It is not uncommon for marriages to take place in the East when the bride is only eight years of age.—Correspondent New York Tribune.

A SENSIBLE WIDOW.—Some years ago a gentleman died. His widow inherited his property, and collected the insurance on his life, and very soon enlarged, repaired, and fitted up her residence in quite a luxurious style. A friend calling, expressed some little surprise that she had made these nice arrangements so soon after the decease of Mr ——. "Why shouldn't I do it," replied the practical relic. "My husband, good man that he was, is enjoying a glorious mansion in the skies, and of course wishes me to be as comfortable as possible here on earth."

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.
QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street,
San Francisco.
Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secresy, and all Sexual Disorders.

TO THE AFFLICTED.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self-Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secresy.

TO FEMALES.
When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, they should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about their troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.
Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.
If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.
Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.,
San Francisco, Cal.

☞ SPERMATORRHŒA.
DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs
This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of Six Cents in Postage stamps for return-postage. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D., San Francisco, Cal.

A RARE GEM OF ART.
"The Lord's Prayer,"
A pen drawing, by Mr. D. F. Brown, is one of the most remarkable works of art ever exhibited in this country. By patient labor he has succeeded in producing a design which for skill and beauty of execution, exquisite softness and delicacy of finish, and general merit, it would seem scarcely possible to surpass. The central figure—the face of our Savior—is one of marvelous power and beauty. This and the faces of the Twelve Apostles, forming the border of the piece, are faithful copies from Leonardo da Vinci's famous painting of the
LAST SUPPER,
Re-producing, with the softest and most perfect shadings, the conceptions and characteristic expressions of the originals. Within this enclosure the words of the Lord's Prayer, in ornamental letters of various original designs and exquisite finish, are an interesting study of art in themselves; while appropriately distributed among these, miniture groups and scenes of marked events of Savior's life, copied from the great masters—five of them from Raphel's celebrated designs—form a harmonious completion of this unique, beautiful and truly wonderful work. The faces of
OUR LORD AND HIS APOSTLES.
Alone, so finely copied, would be a treasure in any house, and worth the full price of subscription.

"Yon may talk to me of Baltimore and Philadelphia and New York, and their railroads and the trade of the Atlantic—let me tell you that the Pacific coast is already beginning to revolutionize the world."—Speech of the Hon. Wm. H. Seward to the people of Annapolis, Maryland, June, 1867.

ADDRESS

TO THE PERMANENT CITIZENS OF THE PACIFIC STATES AND TERRITORIES.

CITIZENS—We enjoy the finest country that the sun shines on, the most varied and fertile soil, the most extensive seaboard, and the greatest breadth of land having the richest metallic deposits possessed by any one nation of the earth, a land affording all the most varied material for manufactures, wools, hides, cotton, silk, coal, fibre gums, wood, and, above all, abundance of every kind of food.

We are only a million of people, and yet have more land and sea than Russia with sixty millions—more land than France and Germany with their hundred millions of people. In the face of those vast resources, there are towns crumbling to decay, men seeking without finding employment. Something wrong here or this would not be happening. Let us consider.

The instructed mind of the population is nearly devoted to political office-seeking. Their ambition is misdirected. The rising youth are trained to idleness. This mode of thinking and training must be reversed if we would hold this magnificent country against the incoming barbarian.

We must teach our youth the glories of manufactures, of commerce, of industry. We must nourish every effort, however rude, at manufacturing what we require. By devoting some of our capital and our young people to manufactures and general industries we shall soon become busy, get rich, bring more and more people into the country, create new wants, build up new factories and villages around them; cultivate more land, build more ships, generate more commerce, and thereby create profitable employment for all who want work.

Now, fellow-citizens, some money capital is required to help on this industrial movement. Where shall we get it? There is a considerable fund which we may divert from its present bed and channel, viz: the Insurance Fund.

Consider. The people of the Pacific States pay two hundred thousand dollars a month to the Insurance Companies for assuring them against losses from fire or shipwreck.

There are some fifteen of those insurance offices in this city, each fishing for its share of this large fund. Each office pays a heavy rent, a half dozen officers and clerks, besides printing and advertising; the lowest cost is a thousand dollars a month on each office, and with some it is double that. There are too many persons employed in the business; too much dozing over newspapers; too much red tape and circumlocution; too high salaries and too little work. Think of two hundred thousand dollars a month! two millions and a half a year!! paid to those sleepy gentlemen for what little they do. This must be reformed. Three or four insurance offices are quite enough for the million of scattered inhabitants of the Pacific States. A dozen of them may be abolished with great benefit to the community: some one or two have already withdrawn. This change would liberate some fifty men of education, whose business capacity would be of much greater service to the community in other branches of industry, such as manufactures, agriculture, commerce, the fisheries, the forests and the mines. This change would also divert a million or two of dollars to other and more needful industries, whereby a thousand fold more of national capital and employment would be generated than by the present drowsy system.

The managers of the Builders' Insurance propose, with the co-operation of the people, that this vast monthly stream of wealth shall be arrested and diverted to the aid of home manufactures, to effect a great reform and remove from the people's shoulders the expense of supporting a small army of insurance clerks and agents. The Builders' Insurance Company has passed through its first year (the most trying) with singular success. It has gathered a hundred thousand dollars, paid promptly all its losses, and established a business income of fully twenty thousand dollars a month! This has been done while we were yet but an experiment, and enjoying the confidence of only a portion of the public. We now appeal to the entire people. We ask them to send their insurance business to us on the following conditions, and soon we shall have an income of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS A MONTH, and here is what we shall do with the money:

First, we calculate, from our present experience, that we shall lose by fire and marine disasters half our monthly income (on our first year's experience our "losses" were but one-third of our income.)

Suppose then that our income shall be worked up to one hundred thousand dollars a month, and suppose that we shall pay out losses to the extent of fifty thousand dollars a month, we shall still have fifty thousand dollars a month to bank up, (or half a million a year.) We propose to make two parts of this sum—one part (a quarter of a million a year) to be invested in City Bonds, to protect the assured, and one part (about a quarter of a million a year) we propose to convert into a

MANUFACTURERS' LOAN FUND,

Which shall be lent exclusively to manufacturers on mortgage of their premises and machinery, at as low rate of interest and on as long time as is generally current on real estate.

By the aid of this fund the budding industries of the Pacific States may be nourished into active life; more and varied employments can be originated for the people; immigration may be welcomed and not feared; the farmer will have got a market at his own door for the produce of his land; the manufacturer will find a lively home demand from the farmer for the products of his machines.

All this, good people, can be achieved by your own votes at your own firesides, without the aid of Congress or the Legislature—it is simply to vote that your insurance shall go to the BUILDERS', by which vote you shall enable us to plant factories all over the country. You shall fill the rivers and harbors with busy ships; you shall send out upon the distant waves fishing expeditions that will bring back wealth to your cities: you shall form a nursery of seamen around your own shores—the ova of a future commerce and a protective navy; you will create the hum of busy workmen in every desirable locality on the Pacific coast; you will bring from neglected fields produce of the utmost value; all of which will most certainly multiply a thousand fold the wealth of the country in which your lot is cast, making a worthy home for yourselves and a future country for your offspring.

People of the Pacific States and Territories! We pledge ourselves to you to effect, with your co-operation, some of those things. We have kept all our pledges so far, and have uttered nothing that was not true. Already have we helped to move the shuttle and the loom, which others, with more means, have passed by and neglected. Already have we helped to build and rig ships in our own dock-yards, and sent them over the wide waves in search of riches for the city. Already have we given many liberal bounties and donations to the deserving institutions of the city. Give your vote to the BUILDERS', and we shall share its profits with every useful charity and every honest industry, and help along every enterprise that promises benefit to the people.

We call for the yeas and nays.

The Ladies are of one mind in pronouncing BOWMAN'S AMERICAN WASHING COMPOUND the best preparation for washing and cleaning in use. It is acknowledged to be a saving both in money and labor. The Compound softens the dirt, consequently the clothes require not more than one-half the rubbing necessary in washing by the old method: besides all who give it a trial acknowledge that their clothes are made whiter in washing with this Compound, than they were ever known to be by using any other preparation. For washing Woolen Goods and Flannels it cannot be equaled. Calicoes that can be washed with soap, without fading, are washed in the water used for boiling the white clothes. This Compound has been used in the eastern States for the past three years with perfect success. Warranted not to injure the clothes. For sale by all Grocers.

AYER'S PILLS

ARE PARTICULARLY ADAPTED to derangements of the Digestive Apparatus, and diseases arising from Impurity of the Blood. A large part of all the complaints that afflict mankind originate in one of these, and consequently these PILLS are found to cure many varieties of Disease. They are sugar-coated, and hence may be taken readily by the most sensitive and delicate persons.
Subjoined are the statements from some eminent physicians, of their effects in their practice:

AS A FAMILY PHYSIC.

From Dr. E. W. Cartwright, of New Orleans—Your Pills are the prince of purges. Their excellent qualities surpass any cathartic we possess. They are mild, but very certain and effectual in their action on the bowels, which makes them invaluable to me in the daily treatment of disease.

FOR JAUNDICE / ALL LIVER COMPLAINTS.

From Dr. Theodore [illegible], of New York City—Not only are your Pills admirably adapted to their purpose as an aperient, but I find their beneficial effects upon the Liver very marked indeed. They have in my practice proved more effectual for the cure of Bilious Complaints than any one remedy I can mention. I sincerely rejoice that we have at length a purgative which is worthy the confidence of the profession and the people.

DYSPEPSIA—INDIGESTION.

From Dr. Henry J. Knox, of St. Louis—The Pills you were kind enough to send me have been all used in my practice, and have satisfied me that they are truly an extraordinary medicine. So peculiarly are they adapted to the diseases of the human system, that they seem to work upon them alone. I have cured some cases of Dyspepsia and Indigestion with them, which had resisted the other remedies we commonly use. Indeed I have experimentally found them to be effectual in almost all the complaints for which you recommend them.

FOR HEADACHE—SICK HEADACHE—FOUL STOMACH—PILES—DROPSY—PLETHORA—PARALYSIS—FITS—DYSENTERY—DIARRHŒA—RELAX—ETC., ETC.

From Dr. Edward Boyd, Baltimore—Dear Dr. Ayer: I cannot answer you what complaints I have cured with your Pills better than to say all that we ever treat with a purgative medicine. I place great dependence on an effectual cathartic in my daily contest with disease, and believe as I do that your Pills afford us the best we have, I of course value them highly.

☞ Most of the Pills in market contain mercury, which although a valuable remedy in skillful hands, is dangerous in a public pill, from the dreadful consequences that frequently follow its incautious use. These contain no mercury or mineral substances whatever.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine everywhere.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

A Sensible Move.

At the last meeting of the Board of Supervisors a petition, signed by one hundred and sixty persons, in relation to the muzzling of dogs, was presented, and referred to the Committee on Health and Police. The petitioners prayed for the passage of an ordinance making it optional to pay a dog tax of say $2 per annum, or to muzzle their dogs. They objected to the muzzles, because the dogs could neither eat or drink with them on; besides which, they were an intense annoyance to pointers and setters. They contended that, as there was no hydrophobia in Caltfornia, their dogs never went rabid, and that the tax proposed would augment the treasury receipts. With the very slightest effort, six thousand signatures could have been obtained. The persons who make a living out of skinning dead dogs, and selling them, may object to the granting of this petition, but no one else can do so. There are many more reputable modes of gaining a living than prowling around a city and kidnapping quiet little spaniels, inoffensive poodles, and noble unsuspecting newfoundlands. If this petition is not granted, the day will come when some young Kanaka Whittington, will become Lord Mayor of the Sandwich Islands, in consequence of arriving in San Francisco, the possessor of the only dog seen for years in the State of San Francisco. The cause of the scarcity of cats in the barbarous country where Richard Whittington achieved his wealth was this: The savage monarch of the country, in consequence of his eldest child having provoked a cat to bite it, issued a decree providing that all cats found running around without muzzles should be killed. The sausage trade flourished—as it does in San Francisco—epidemic diseases appeared, rats and mice multiplied, and by the time the last cat had been slaughtered the savage king and his idiotic subjects became aware of the folly they had committed. It is all very well to say that we need not wait for a Whittington to bring us a dog, because we can telegraph for a thousand dogs if we want them; but in the meantime, think of the inconvenience we may suffer. Let the members of the present Board of Supervisors do one sensible thing before the time comes for them to leave office. Let them grant that sensible petition, or else go to the dogs as fast as they can.

"The Dog Law."

An admirable article, under the above title, appears in the Bulletin of Thursday, Oct. 10th. The Bulletin is generally found on the side of the weak and defenceless, and we are glad to perceive that it has at length spoken a word for the dogs. It says, speaking of the law at present in force:

The fact is, that the present dog law is not only absurd and cruel, but does not even effect its object. In the two first characteristics, it is not different from the legislation of the last half century upon this subject, which is now clearly shown to have been based on the shallowest ignorance and the blindest superstition. The old belief in the heathen "dog days," and the theory that the months of July and August were peculiarly provocative of canine madness have been exploded by the common sense of statistics. Yet our dog law is copied from Eastern statute books, applied to a country where rabies is almost unknown, and the prohibition extends through the entire year. It is no more ridiculous to kill dogs in New York or Boston, because "Sirius, the dog star rages," than it is to kill them in San Francisco, because a few have been "vicious"—a complaint neither epidemic nor incurable. Until it can be more clearly proven that our climate developes an undue ferocity in lap dogs, setters and spaniels—though it be entirely distinct from hydrophobia and without fatal results—such a law must be foolish, unjust and criminal, and the sooner it is repealed the better.

Of course there are vicious dogs in San Francisco, just as there are vicious men—though, perhaps, not in equal proportion—but this fact does not warrant placing the innocent and the guilty on an equal footing. Dogs have rights, and good dogs should not be persecuted because bad dogs bite, any more than good men should be deprived of their right to enjoy life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The Bulletin did a good deal towards defeating Gorham, who knows whether it may not influence the Board of Supervisors to grant the petition for the repeal of the existing dog law?

A Dearth of News.

The cartoon in the last number of Punch, from the pencil of the inimitable Teniel, represents Mr. Punch asleep, and floating round him are visions of the wonderful creations of the daily press during the dull season of the year. The large gooseberry is there, the shower of frogs makes its appearance, the toad imbedded in a stone quarry for three thousand years smiles grimly on him, and the apparitions of other old acquaintances disturb his slumbers. The London press is pretty good at manufacturing whoppers, but the newspapers of these great and glorious United States can beat it. The following which is going the rounds of the press isn't bad:

"A washerwoman in Milwaukee, known as "Old Kate," died recently, with curious symptoms. The doctors found a number of large live crabs in her stomach. She had probably drank the eggs in water."

"Old Kate" must have been very fond of salt water as a beverage, to have swallowed a number of crab's eggs. Perhaps, however, Milwaukee crabs live in fresh water. If this is the case, it would be interesting to ascertain how long "Old Kate" was engaged in hatching the crab's eggs which she drank, and also, whether or not, she ever drank whisky. From our knowledge of washerwomen, we have no hesitation pronouncing the above story, an infamous fabrication. Washerwomen use water to wash with, but we do not believe that "Old Kate," if she was a fair representitive of her class, ever swallowed enough water, either salt or fresh, to enable her to get down a crab's egg the size of one of Wright's Vegetable Pills.

Important Intelligence.

The Bulletin is to some extent, imitating the Alta and striving to become sprightly. The following important paragraphs served to fill up its leading editorial column yesterday:

MR. A. JONES and Mr. M. McCool are to give joint exhibitions in the West. How beautiful to see brethren spar together in unity.

THERE are five patent egg hatching machines in this country. Why don't somebody now invent patent eggs?

MRS. SENATOR WILSON has lately undergone a successful operation for cancer.

The first of these jokes is very fine. Bible jokes are always good; it might be added to by saying, that Providence cares for the fall of a "sparrer," and Jones and McCool are of more value than many "sparrers." The egg joke isn't bad, but the intelligence that Mrs. Senator Wilson has lately undergone a successful operation for cancer, suggests painful thoughts, and casts a shade of sorrow over the spirits of those who have been excited to merriment by the fun contained in the preceding paragraphs.

However, the Bulletin must make an effort to be amusing. A two column report of a trial for murder on the high seas, another column composed of "Squatter Riot," and "Dens of Crime in San Francisco," are pretty heavy balast for a paper.

A Bad School for Wives.

The commencement exercises of the Toland Medical College, were held on Thursday evening at the American Theatre. Dr. Blake took advantage of the occasion to make some terribly severe remarks with respect to the system of overtasking girls in the public schools:

He said some of these schools and colleges were great manufacturies of invalids, and that he would not advise any of them who sought a healthy wife to marry a girl who takes a diploma at one of those institutions. In some countries there were laws to prevent children being overtasked in cotton mills and such places and restricting the hours. He thought some such legislation, to regulate the school system was wanted in this country.

This is rather rough on the public schools; if Dr. Blake's assertion be indeed true, the sooner a change in the system is made, the better. Our Californian girls are the most beautiful in the world, and it won't do to have them spoiled by too much schooling. It is a fact that there is too much unnatural, unhealthy, intellectual cramming practised in many schools, and that much of the hastily swallowed learning administered, fails to be any service to the mind, and the manner in which it is administered, seriously injures the physical constitution.

A Fitz Smythe on the "Call."

Now the Call has a Fitz Smythe. The Alta is doing much mischief among the newspapers of the city. Each one of them thinks it is necessary to have a fool on the establishment. The local of the Call in Wednesday's issue published the following as fun:—

SENDING HIM SEED.—Mr. Perkins, the celebrated seed-grower of Alameda County, has packed one hundred and thirty varieties of California seeds, and will forward them to the Emperor of Russia, by the next steamer. As Mr. Perkins can't see the Emperor, he is going to have it to say that he "seed" him.

We have seen and talked to the inmates of lunatic asylums, we were at one time deeply interested in an Asylum for Idiots, but we never, no, never, did either a lunatic, or an idiot perpetrate such a "joke" as that. Why was not a copy of the Call sent to the Paris Exposition as a sample of the literature of California?

Twopence More and up goes the Donkey.

The Avitor is bound to go up, but nothing can raise it but more funds. Gas won't raise the Avitor, money must be had. The process of reconstruction is now nearly complete and in a very short time, up goes the Avitor. TREM.

PEG-LEG SMITH—A TRUE STORY OF THE PIONEERS.

BY CHARLES PORTER SUMNER.

IN the "rainy season" of 1851 I accidently found myself in the town of Auburn, California, as the guest of Col. Harry C—, the agent in that vicinity at that time of Adams & Co.'s Express. I need hardly remark, at this late date, that the "rainy" season in the land of gold is no misnomer, a young duck being about the only biped who could be entirely happy during its continuance. The miners, of course, welcome it as it ensures them plenty of water in the "diggings," but even a man who is taking out forty dollars to the pan may be excused if he grumbles a little at being obliged to do it in a state of chronic dampness. Colonel Harry and myself had the reputation of being "gay ducks," but we were neither waterfowl nor miners, and we therefore "kept out of the wet" as much as possible, proving that we "knew enough to go in when it rained," at least.

Now I had gone to Auburn for the express purpose of exploring the mines themselves, and as this could not be either comfortably or adequately performed under such circumstances, I found my occupation gone, and was forced to look for amusement to whatever might be going on inside the tavern at which I had taken up my quarters. This house, dignified by the title of "Auburn Hotel," was quite in keeping, both in structure and internal arrangements, with its surroundings; and they were queer enough, as any miner of that period will confess. It consisted of a wooden building, gable-ended and two stories in height, looking exactly like a New England barn, with windows cut in it at just such places as an intelligent man would not expect them to be, and coated all over with a dingy brown substance intended for *white*wash. The only doors facing the street were, however, placed in one corner, (instead of in the centre, as a barn door should be,) but with this exception the simile holds good.

The interior was, nevertheless, the most striking feature of the establishment, especially when it is recollected that the building was a hotel—and a remarkably good one for that time and region. The lower floor, some forty feet square, was divided into exactly equal portions by a large canvas curtain, the outer division being the bar-room and social hall, while the inner was the dining-room and kitchen, to which a slit in the center of the canvass gave access. The upper floor, which was reached by a ladder in the dining-room, consisted of one large room closely filled with wooden cots and straw beds, accommodating some fifty guests. If a greater number chanced to be in the house at once, the "surplus" took their chance anywhere on the floors.

In the bed-room of this unique hostelry it was my good fortune to become acquainted with the subject of this sketch, under the following stirring circumstances. Several storm-bound travelers, inclusive of myself, had been sitting, during the quarter part of the afternoon, around the ample fire-place, and, as evening drew near, conversation became exhausted, and, in consequence of which, and the influence of the ceaseless rain, we were about as melancholy a party as can well be imagined. At this critical moment sundry sounds, as of a horse floundering through the knee-deep mud at the door, aroused our attention, and instantly afterwards a rich, mellow voice, commanding the animal to halt, was heard.

"There's Peg-leg Smith!" exclaimed one of our party, arousing himself with an unmistakable expression of interest. "I thought he was in Sacrament."

(It may be here interpolated, to avoid confusion, that the worthy miner meant "Sacramento," and not the Eucharist.)

"It's him, sure enough," said another, rising and lounging to the door. "Now, I guess, we'll have some fun."

The advent of the unknown certainly seemed to interest my companions for the first speaker and another arose and joined the second at the small window cut in the door. Scarcely had they reached his side, when an exclamation from all three brought the rest of us to our feet.

"Jehoss-a-phat!" cried one of them. "He's going it already! Come here, boys."

We went accordingly and the scene revealed to us through this dirty little window, certainly repaid the trouble. Directly opposite to the door of the tavern, and some thirty paces distant, was a small mound, on the top of which was placed the curb and windlass of a well, which probably had been dug previous to the occupation of the locality by the miners. At the side of the well-curb, and lying at full length on the platform surrounding it, was an old man—sixty years of age at least—and over him, in a threatening attitude, stood a rough, villainous-looking biped of not more than thirty. Our conclusions as to the meaning of the tableau were prompt, and fully borne out by the facts as we subsequently heard them. The old man had been drawing water while the young ruffian was waiting to do the same, and the motions of the former not being rapid enough to suit the latter, he had, without further provocation, incontinently knocked the old gentleman down.

But this was not the only, or the main, cause of my companions' curiosity. Directly in front of us, and making his way as rapidly as circumstances would admit, towards the scene of conflict was the most extraordinary personage I had yet seen in the mines, and who must now be described in a manner to a correct understanding of the subject which follows. Imagine, then, a man not more than five feet-two in height, but so stoutly built that he weighed nearly fourteen stone, with scanty, iron-gray hair, overhanging jaws, and an eye like a hawk's, the whole face expressive of intense determination, but, at the same time, anything but repulsive, and you have Peg-leg Smith in all but one particular. This was, however, an important one. His left leg was wholly wanting, from a point just below the joint of the knee, and the place of the lower limb was supplied by a singular peg of wood and iron firmly strapped to the stump.

This machine was unlike any wooden-leg I had ever seen, but it answered his purpose admirably; for he made his way through the deep, tenacious mud, with a curious motion, compounded of a jerk and a hop, at a speed perfectly astonishing under the circumstances. The spectacle was not only wonderful but so extremely ludricous that my mind involuntarily called up the idea of a fat goose on stilts, a simile which, when I repeated it aloud to my companions, called forth from one of them a solemn remark which effectually banished all desire to laugh from me for some time. The remark was in substance:

"Stranger, I advise you not to let Pete hear you call him a goose. There'd be trouble—sure's you're born!"

By this time, however, my hero arrived at the scene of action, and his proceedings were then so interesting that my unfortunate speech was speedily forgotten. He reached the platform directly behind the bully (who was still stooping over his victim, quite oblivious of the new-comer's presence) and grasping the well-curb with one hand, and balancing himself on his sound leg, he deliberately lifted the wooden one, with which he administered a most tremendous kick on the posterior portion of the stooping form of the other! The effect was instantaneous and reliable. With one plunge the bully fell headlong from the platform to the bottom of the mound, a distance of some ten feet, and striking in the soft mud, he remained buried in it up to his shoulders for several seconds kicking frantically to extricate himself the while.

The laugh was now with me, and we enjoyed it heartily, until a change came o'er the spirit of the scene. After lifting the old man up "Pete" began leisurely to descend the hill, and had reached a point half-way down, when the bully regained his legs. Suddenly we saw the latter, (still spluttering and wiping the mud from his eyes with his left hand,) thrust his right behind him and draw forth a revolver. One of my companions instantly threw open the door, and shouted loudly:

"Look out, Pete! He's goin' to shoot!"

Most men would have been discomposed at this sudden and alarming announcement, but our hero was made of cooler stuff. Thrusting his peg-leg deep in the mud, he quickly swung round on it as a pivot, and drawing his own revolver, had the ruffian "covered" before the latter had recovered his eyesight by clearing off the covering of mud.

"Take care, stranger," said Peg-leg Pete with perfect calmness, "I've got a bead on you and I never miss. Drop that shootin'-iron and walk down hill, or I'll——"

He did not need to finish the sentence. The bully saw that, if he made the least motion to cock or aim his weapon, he was a dead man, and, dropping the pistol, he turned and went splashing through the mud towards the gulch at the speed of a quarter-horse! That night he received a "vigilant" notice to quit, and I need scarcely say that he was never again seen in "them diggin's."

Smith now came towards us and began to remove the saddle from his horse, which had been quietly standing before the door. I noticed, then, that in the place of a stirrup on the left side of the saddle, a long pouch or socket of strong leather was attached to the flap at a convenient point, and I rightly conjectured that, when its owner was on horseback, this socket had the honor of receiving his peg-leg. The saddle itself was made in the Mexican fashion—than which there are none more easy or secure—and I readily believed, what I was afterwards told, that, with its aid and the socket, the wildest mustang on the prairies could hardly unseat him. In fact, he was one of the best riders on the plains.

The landlord now appeared to take the horse to the stable, and Smith entered the bar-room, greeting those who knew him with hearty joviality. He was speedily introduced to those who had been strangers to him and I was astonished to find, when I was thus placed near him, that the whole of his great weight (for so short a man) was made up entirely of bone and muscle. There was not an ounce of superfluous fat about him, and I was at once convinced that he was capable of enduring every hardship and fatigue. He was, in fact, an abbreviated Hercules, and in perfect fighting condition.

The whisky was here circulated in his honor, and congratulations were showered upon him as to his late exploit—of which, however, he made very light.

"Psho!" said he in that rich, mellow voice, the very index of good humor, which I had before remarked; "Psho! I'm obleeged to ye, Ben, for tellin' me he'd got his weepun out, but that kind o'cuss could never kill me! He mought ha' hit me—I don't say agin that—but the bullet hain't run yet that'll wipe me out."

This sounded so very much like "brag" that I was at first much surprised, but before I went to rest that night I had heard enough about him to strongly coincide with him in the opinion thus modestly expressed. The fact was, that Peter Smith was one of the most noted trappers, scouts, and guides on the Western Plains, and if one-third only of the tales told about him were true, he certainly must have borne a charmed life against bullet or arrow, wild Indian or wild beast. The most singular part of his history was that he had lost his leg when only twenty-five years of age, (he was over fifty when I saw him,) and for nearly twenty-five years more he had followed the same adventurous life, gaining fame by his exploits continually. Finding himself "gittin" a little stiff at last," as he expressed it, he had, some three years before, settled on a farm in the San Jose Valley, which his wife attended to while he roamed about the country.

While the conversation had been going on, night had fallen and supper time had arrived. Col. Harry C——, who boarded at the hotel, joined me while the meal was in progress, and the whole company, having satisfied their appetites, drew around the fire in the bar-room to enjoy a social chat. California is, as every one is aware, the land of marvelous adventure and "hair-breadth 'scapes by flood and field." Not one of that company but had been in imminent peril of life or limb scores of times—saving myself, perhaps, and I was hardly an exception, as I may have an opportunity to relate at some future period. It was not surprising, therefore, that I heard, during the evening, many tales bordering on the marvelous, one of which I now propose to recount:—no other, indeed, than narration of the circumstances under which Peg-leg Smith lost that most useful member, his left leg.

"Captain Smith," said Col. Harry, during a pause in the conversation, brought about by his production of a certain flask of "Red Eye" thereabouts; "Captain Smith, my friend and myself have a great curiosity, pardonable I hope, to hear how you lost your leg. If you have no objection to tell us the story—for a story must be connected with it, I am sure—you would decidedly oblige us."

"I haint no objection, I'm sure," responded the Captain with genuine courtesy, "but it hain't no great shakes of a story, an' I reckon most of the present company has hearn on it afore."

The response was in the affirmative, as to their previous knowledge of the facts, by most of the party, but they one and all protested that it was a story, and one worth repeating; they would therefore be highly pleased to hear it from his lips, their information having been obtained from other quarters, perhaps not so reliable. The worthy captain required urging, and it was easily perceived, from his manner, that nothing discreditable to himself was connected with the adventure. Thus urged, then, he first "moistened his clay" with a generous libation of the "perticular," and settling himself easily in his chair, so as to bring his "peg" well to the front, thus began:

"Forty four years ago, come next June, this here individooal found himself standin' in the road, near an old farm house, not many miles from the very middle of York State, with a Spanish sixpence and four cents in copper, in his pocket, and not one friend or relation in the world. I think I was risin' eight year old then, and I've some belief, yet, that I knowed my mammy and daddy when I was a babby. For nigh four year, though, I'd lived with the man that owned the farm house I spoke of, and he'd been pretty good to me, but he died that very mornin' and his wife, who didn't like me, immegently cuffed me out into the road and told me to go about my business.

"I mought be s'posed that I hadn't any partic'lar business to go about then, so I stood there a considerable spell raythor undecided what to do. I didn't, really, even know what my name was. When my mammy and daddy died I was too young to know, and I'd allus been called 'Pete' in the farm house, so I was about as poor as any boy you ever heered on. I kept a thinkin' a little while, and by-and-bye I came to a realizin' sense of my situation. I knew it was no use to go back to the house, for the old woman had eight or ten boys and gals of her own, about as many as she could rake and scrape for. It was that that made her mad at me at first. She and her old man had allus been quarrelin' about his bringing a panper brat home to take care of, and robbin' his own children, and I can't blame her for much now, though it came rather hard then.

"I need't be particular as to what I did for a livin' at that time, or for sometime arter. I was a smart chunk of a boy for my age, and I worked among the farmers around there for a spell, gettin' enough to eat and growin' reg'lar until I could work for pay. I kept comin' farther west all the time, til bime-bye I found myself on the Ohio river and took to flat-boatin,' like a 'Digger' does to snakes. I don't know adzactly how long I followed that, but when I was about twenty years old I found myself in St. Louey with a hoss, and a rifle that never missed, and had joined hands to go with a party of trappers out onto the plains.

"Then came hard times, sure enough? Ef it wasn't that I got to love the life, for its freedom and excitement, in a very short time I'd ha' broken down and gin up a dosen times. One spell we'd be trackin' a sand plain without water for forty-eight hours and more, under a sun that burnt up your ha'r and your hide till it smoked. Another time we'd get on the mountains in a snow storm that fell eight feet deep on a level in twenty hours. That little fall, by-the-bye, snowed us up in a cañon for three weeks, but one died; and when we got out we had to loot it two hundred miles before we got onto the open plain where game was plenty. We lived on the meat of our horses on that march, for when they died we chopped 'em up and packed with us to keep life in our bellies. It was a tough time and we didn't go much among the mountains, in winter, arter that.

"Then thar was the Ingins. You folks what only read about 'em and see nothin' wuss nor a 'Digger' all your lives, you hain't any idea what a Ingin really is. A full blooded Comanche or Blackfoot warrior is the nearest thing to Satan I ever expec' to see before I go under; and not then, I hope. Cunning as a fox, sly as a red squirrel, fuller of tricks nor both together, knowin' all you know, and a good deal more, about the woods and the plains, and merciless as a starved painter when he pulls down a buck, don't begin to give 'em half a character. When you've got to fight as they fight and haint got the odds on your side, I'd rather tackle single handed, ten white men o' the settlements, or twenty yellow-belly Mexicans, any day.

"But its no use spinnin' a long yarn about life on the plains—you must go and try it, for ten years or so, if you want to know about it—so I'll git ahead with what you wanted me to tell ye. I'd been follerin' trappin' for more than four years, and had got to like it almost as well as eatin' venison, when Sim Ballard, Nate Thomas, Joe Brady and myself found ourselves one day in a little cañon way up on the head waters of the Arkansas. We had started out from Whitestone three weeks before, and hadn't pushed on very fast, for it was airly in the season and we had plenty o' time to git to the huntin' grounds. One of our hosses was a little sick, so we concluded to camp at that place for a day or two and doctor him up. It was a pretty place, now I tell you! The hollow—for it was only made by two rollin' hills not very high—ran straight up from the river for about a quarter of a mile and then swelled up into the hills. The hills themselves were cotton-woods and white-barks, thick enough to hollow pretty well, but not so close as to make it troublesome to git through 'em. In the hollow itself there wasn't a single tree, 'cept right in the middle, and there was a grove of about twenty as pretty white-barks as ever I see. They stood on a little mound nigh ten feet nor the rest of the valley, and in the middle o' this there was another hollow, so the mound made a ring round it. The grass was thick all over and full o' yallar and blue and white flowers, there was plenty o' shade from the sun, and we could see the river windin' past the ends o' the hills like a sheet o' silver. A prettier place for a camp couldn't be found from the Hills to the Lake o' the Woods.

"Well, here we camped, right in the hollow in the grove, so the ring o' the mound was all round us, and made a first-rate cover if any of the red devils should come across us. We didn't expec' nothin' o' the kind, for we'd seen no Ingin sign as we come along, and we took a scout on the trail ahead, the first day, and saw none there. But I told you before that there's no calculatin' the cunnin' of a full-blooded Ingin, and perhaps we weren't so well posted about 'em then as we got to be arterwards. Howsomever, they was all round us, and watchin' us close, at that very time, and we found it out at last in rather a rough fashion.

"In the day time we picketed our horses in the valley, so they could get plenty of grass, and at night we coralled 'em inside the mound. Two on us went huntin' at a time, and tother two stayed in the camp, taken turns to sleep in the day time so we could watch at night. On the fourth night 'twas my first watch, and I was walkin' up and down thinkin' how bright stars looked through the tops o' the trees, when, all of a sudden, I heered a dry branch crack like some one had trod on it, just outside the mound. That was enough for me. You never can be too keerful under such circumstances, and I had the boys waked in about a jiffy. It mought, in course, have been a deer, or a painter, for we'd signs o' both and shot some o' the deer, but it was a great deal better to be waked up twenty times than to lose your ha'r while you was sleeping.

"I wasn't a minute too quick nyther, for we'd scarcely got to our stations—which I needn't say we had ready picked out aforehand—when such a yell broke out, on the north side of the mound, as I hope none o' you may have 'casion to hear all your born days, and the next minute we saw the red-devils rushin' through the trees toward the fire. Four on 'em dropped as soon as we did see 'em, and, not expectin' such a greetin,' the others retreated arter given us a volley which didn't tetch any on us. Only one thing saved us on that first rush, though we was awake. You see the ring around the monnd was only ahout two feet high on the north side, while in every other part it was from six to eight. Of course the red skins had heen reconnitrin' long enough to find out that that was the only part where they wouldn't have to climh, and as they wanted to surprise us they choose that place so that they could rush right into the fire. That made them all keep together, so when four on 'em fell to once, they saw we was awake and fell hack to try a fresh plan. Ef they could ha' come on us all sides to once we were gone coons, sure.

"It was most mornin' before they tried it agin, and this time they got covers behind the trees on the north side o' the mound. Of course we had to go to cover in the same way on the other side and there we kept it up till hroad daylight. We killed two more before that and found out, when we could see, that there was only eight on 'em left. Shortly arter day break they tried to retreat agin, hut of course they uncovered themselves a little and two more dropped in their tracks. Another put his hand on his rump and yelled as though he'd heen burnt with a red-hot ramrod. That scared the rest so that they hroke and run without tryin' for any shelter, and like dam fools we hroke arter them.

"We had just got outside o' the mound when they got to the trees on the side-hills, and stoppin' there behind 'em, they gave us a volley that settled me at least. At that very instant I thought a whole mountain had fell on my left foot, and before I knew it I was lyin' flat on my face hleedin' like a stuck pig. Tho rest o' the hoys pushed on and managed to settle two more o' the red devils, and I don't think the other three has stopped runnin' yet they was so hadly scared.

"I mought as well say now that the reason why we settled so many on 'em, and they didn't hurt us more, was that our rifles was first rate ones, true as a die, while theirs was Guv'ment guns given 'em by the agents to hunt with; hesides we knew how to handle ours, and in those days guns was mostly new to Ingins. They know more ahout 'em now and I don't see, for the life o' me, why Guv'ment gives 'em guns. They hunted well enough for themselves with their bows and arrows and traps before they ever heard of a gun, and even if they starved all out it would he better for them and us.

"There wasn't one on us hut was wounded more or less, but I was worst hurt as the boys found when they come to pick me up. They keep on their feet and get around pretty spry arter they'd handaged their hurts, hut I had a ball plump through my left ankle which smashed all the bones into splinters!

"They picked me up and carried me inside the mound and made me as comfortahle as they could, but that wasn't much. Arter we had a council what we should do and finally made up our minds we must take the back track to the first settlement ahout a hundred miles away. But then came the question what was to he done with me? It was plain enough that to start in the state I was the leg would mortify before I got half way, and I was a gone coon, sure. The hoys had a talk among themselves and then Sim Ballard told me what they thought:

"'Pete,' said he, 'there's one chance for ye—and only one. Ef we can get that mashed foot off of ye and rest here a few days till the worst pain is over, we may git ye into Darhy's ranch on horsehack hy goin' slow. Ef ye start as ye are, or ef you stay here as you are, you'll mortify and die, sure. We'll stay by ye, in course, but we can't doctor up such a leg as that, and it's a gonner anyhow. What say ye?"

"We larn to settle things quick out on the plains, and I saw they was right. It was my duty not to go under ef I could help it, so I axed him ef he thonght he could take it off.

"'Well,' said he, 'I seen it done once when I was huntin' with the Crow Ingins and I thiuk I can do it in their fashion.'

"'Go ahead, then,' said I, 'it's my duty not to lose a chance.'

"There was no more talk ahout it, but they went to work to fix things at once. One of our huntin' knives was sharpened on a stone till it would cut a hair. Another one was notched along the edge with a hatchet till it made a tol'ahle good saw, and the barrel of one of the Ingin guns was put in the fire and kept red hot. When they got all this done they propped me up agin a tree and tied me fast so I couldn't move, and then they give me ahout a pint of old Bald Face to drink. I ain't very skeery now, nor I wasn't then, hut when they said the time had come I tell you, boys, I felt like a drawed skunk and no mistake. It was no use to go back though, so I grit my teeth and gave the signal.

"First they tied a strip o' green deer's hide around my leg just ahove the knee, so tight it sunk into the flesh all round: I've got the mark of it now. Then Sim took the sharp knife and cut down to the bones just below the knee. I stood that pretty well for the leg was numh from the tight band round it. Then Joe pulled down the hottom flesh and Sim took the saw-knife and sawed off both hones. That was a teaser, but it was nothing to what was comin', for as soon as the leg dropped, Nate handed Sim the red-hot gun barrel and he rubbed it all over the stump till it fizzled and smoked worse nor a burnt venison steak!

"I just let one yell out o' me you could ha' heerd a mile, and than I don't remember anything more, for, though it may look sneakin', for the first and last time in my life I helieve I fainted away. When I come too they'd got me bandaged up all right, with a hirch hark poultice on the stump and a flask full o' water, with a hole punched in the bottom, tied on to a saplin' so it kept droppin' on the stump all the time. The pain at first was awful and it was more than two weeks before they dared tc move me, but, thank God, the Ingins didn't come nigh us and everything went well. One month and eight days after the operation they got me in to Darhy's ranch, travelin' slow all the time, and liftin' me off the horse whenever I wanted to rest. As mought be s'posed I was nothin hut a skilliton and it was more than six mouths before I was my own man agin. I've had good luck, thank God, pretty nigh ever since, and you may be sure I never wanted to part from those hoys till they all went under, one after the other. "That's the way I lost my leg, Colonel, and now let's liquor, for talkin's dry work."

A STRANGE CAPTURE.

AN ADVENTURE WITH A SLAVER.

SOME years ago, I commanded one of her Britannic Majesty's Dispatch gun vessels, stationed on the west coast of Africa for the suppression of the slave trade. In the course of two years thus engaged we had, as usual, done very little good, and lost a great number of men hy coast fever and sickness generally. A few vessels had heen captured, but many more had slipped through our fingers, hy reason of the treachery of the informers on shore, most of whom eventually proved to he in the pay and interests of the slave-dealers. The slave-captains, too, had become very knowing; they were mostly old hands at the husiness, and contrived to give us the slip in many different ways.

For instance, in chasing them on a dark night, they would show a hright light over the stern, and after we had followed this for some hours would drop a large cask with a large lighted lantern fitted to it, and at the same instant putting out their own light. It was easy for them then to alter their course so as to double back and sail away in the darkness, leaving us intent on watching their false light. This stratagem generally succeeded when the nights were very dark.

Or, when hotly pursued in the daytime, they frequently practised a most inhuman trick to increase their distance When we were close upon them they used to throw a slave overhoard with a plank to cling to, or very often without even that. They well knew that a British man-of-war would not pass a poor wretch struggling in the water and leave him to drown. Thus whilst sail was heing shortened, the ship hove to, hoats lowered, the man picked up, and the vessel got on her course again they contrived to get a fine start ahead, for manœuvres, even in the smartest ship, will take some considerable time; and in this way, as much ground was lost as would take many hours to recover, for a stern chase is a long one.

The luck had been against us for a long time, and after many false informations and fruitless chases, we succeeded in capturing a slaver in a most singular manner, without any chase at all.

It happened in this way. One fine morning, when cruising on the coasts of Loango and Congo, the officer of the watch reported a strange sail in sight. I went on deck, took my glass, and there, surely enough, was a very suspicious-looking craft right ahead. It was a dead calm and we soon steamed up to her.

She was a clipper barque of about four hundred tons. From her taut spars great clouds of snowy canvas flapped heavily against the rigging as her long low hull rolled slowly from side to side on the glossy surface of the heaving ground-swell. Judging from her rakish appearance, and hy her heing a great deal out of the usual track of the homeward or outward bound vessels—in fact, heing in a very suspicious locality—one naturally came to the conclusion that she must he a slaver. I hoped to have very soon the pleasure of lifting her hatches to ascertain whether this assumption was correct or not. As a preliminary step, the demand to show her colors was made; to my great annoyance she hoisted the stars and stripes of America. This precluded the right of search. However, I resolved to board her, and try to detect some signs of her having a hlack cargo. With that object in view I had the gig manned, and in a few minutes was alongside of the doubtful craft.

The captain, a tall, gaunt Yankee, received me at the gangway, and, without waiting to be asked, produced his papers, which seemed to be all regular enough. The barque was the Independence, of Boston, Massachusetts, Robert Stormont, master, from New York to the Cape of Good hope on a trading voyage. She was now homeward hound, and was twenty-seven days out From the Cape, so the captain informed me. Having taxed him with heing out of the usual route, he explained that this was a new notion of his—he kept well over to the eastward so as to make a fair wind of the northeast trades, when he should meet them. Whilst pointing out to him the fallacy of this idea, I took a few turns up and dowu the deck with him, and succeeded in drawing him into a long argument. Whilst thus engaged, I noticed that all the hatches were indeed hattened tightly down; but that there were no things stowed on the top of them as is usually the case in merchant vessels whose hatches are never required to be opened during the voyage. This strengthened my suspicions, and from the captain's extreme eagerness in satisfying all my inquiries, I had very little doubt as to the nature of his cargo.

It was certain that if he had slaves on board, those hatchways could not remain closed for an hour without suffocating them. If they were opened during that time, the presence of the slaves would he easily perceptihle, and in that case the vessel would be a lawful prize.

Consideriug these things, I sat on the taffrail, and taking out a bundle of choice Havanas, proposed a smoke. This the Yankee agreed to, and we smoked away and got tolerably social, although at the same time it was amusing to seo how very fidgety he was getting.

In the course of the conversation it turned out that he had heen in China, and as that was the last station on which I had served we were enabled to compare notes on that suhject. He interested me very much hy giving an account of the clever way in which he suppressed a mutiny that hroke out in his ship on her last voyage. It appeared that he was chartered to take three hundred Chinese coolies, the very dregs of the population, from Hong Kong to California. It occurred to these Celestial vagabonds, some time after the vessel had put to sea, to murder the officers and crew and run away with the ship. In order to effect their purpose they adopted a highly ingenious expedient. Several large hon-fires were made on the lower deck and a cry of "Fire, fire," was raised; the Chinamen thinking that the officers and crew would all rush down below to put the fire out, and then they would he easily able to fall upon them with knives, and murder them all simultaneously. But our friend, the captain, far too wide awake for that, simply had all the hatches hattened down, and smothered the Chinamen in their smoke. When they were sufficiently choked and thus reduced to suhjection, he demanded that they should deliver up the ringleaders of the mutiny. This they did, and without any trial he hung them, six in number, at the foreyard-arm the same day.

We continued thus, spinning yarns and smoking for some time longer, when a hreeze sprang up, and the Yankee, thinking to shake me off, said—

"Wa'al stranger, guess we've got the wind at last. I'm sorry you must say good-hye, but I reckon I must fill away and go on my course, for I can't afford to he stopping here all day talking."

"Don't mention it, my dear friend," I replied. "You see there is no necessity for that. I may just as well go your way as any other, for I'm only cruising. Here, take another cigar and settle down again."

I then shouted to the first lieutenant to keep within hail, on the same course as the harque. Upon this the Yankee's long, sallow face darkened and grew longer; he was evidently much put out.

He certainly did not appear to appreciate this act of courtesy on my part. I kept on talking, and tried to involve him in another argument, anything for an excnse to pass the time. But he was trying equally hard to put an end to the conversation hy sullenly replying "yes" and "no" to everything, and never volunteering a remark or comment of his own. Bnt in nowise put out hy his hroad hints, I commenced a series of long winded stories, keeping him at the same time well supplied with cigars.

It was delightful to see how excessively nervous and fidgety he was. He well knew that if this lasted much longer his cargo would not he worth much; so he kept on giving me the strongest hints to go, all of which I pretended not to understand. At length he appeared to be losing his temper, and the more cross he got the more ohtusely good natured and urhane I became.

I now very quickly hrought matters to an issue by hailing the gig that was towing astern.

"Gig there."

"Sir," replied the coxswain.

"Go on hoard and get your dinners, and tell the first lieutenant to send the boat hack with some more cigars in an hour's time, and say that I have found the captain such a remarkably agreeable man that I intend to spend the afternoon with him. D'you understand?"

"Ay, ay, sir."

When our friend the Yankee heard this he let fly a volley of oaths and then said resignedly—

"Guess it's no use, captain. I'm fairly smoked out this time; the ships yours, I reckon," and then, turning to the mate, "Here, Nathan, haul down that flag and git them hatches up and let them unfort'nit cusses git some air, for I reckon they're smothered pretty considerable. This is a dodge as I never heerd on afore."

She had nearly six hundred slaves on hoard. I am glad to say none died of suffocation through my ruse. She was the hest prize that we took during that commission.—Cassel's Magazine.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

SCIENCE VS. LITERATURE.

In the CALIFORNIAN of September 21st, we gave several columns to the discussion now going on between the devotees of classics and those of physical science. The interest which the question must possess for all scholars and persons of scholarly taste, together with its great importance in a practical point of view with reference to its bearing upon the scheme of education to be adopted in the future in our colleges and academies, furnishes sufficient apology for recurring to it.

The men of science, or at least a large portion of them, seem inclined in this discussion, not so much to oppose the claims of the ancient classic languages and literature to a prominent place in our higher educational systems, as to oppose the claims of literature altogether; science, they think, should occupy not merely a large space in the curriculum, but it should pretty nearly monopolize it. Among the more noteworthy articles to be found in the Eastern periodical press, elicited by Dr. Youmans' "Modern Culture," is one in a recent number of the New York Nation, in which it is argued that the reform most urgently needed in our system of liberal education, consists not so much in the substitution of one branch of studies for another, as in the more liberal, rational, and intelligent pursuit of all branches. Says the writer:

"Whether we study antiquity in Felton's 'Ancient and Modern Greece,' or science in Cooke's 'Chemical Physics,' we are equally wasting our time over profitless and ill digested details. But on the other hand, in studying Grote's 'Plato' or Grove's 'Correllation of Physical Forces,' we are truly educating ourselves; we are not only gaining priceless information, but acquiring mental discipline—deftness in the use of scientific methods of research. It is a grave error to suppose that fairness of mind, accuracy of judgment, or shrewdness of perception are to be secured by abandoning one class of studies for another. In the main, these things belong as much to one kind of research as to another kind. The narrowness and torpidity—the 'Kronian' characteristics (to use an Aristophanic word)—of classically educated men are due far more to the irrational method in which they have pursued their studies than to those studies themselves. Let the student really fathom who Julius Cæsar was, what he thought, what he did, wherein he differed from Marcus Cato or another, why his policy succeeded, and what its effects have been upon all human generations down to our time—let him duly fathom all this, and he will have gone far toward getting as good a political education as a man needs to have. Let him, again, justly estimate the value of ancient chronology; let him, for instance, intelligently appreciate the fact that much of Bunsen's and Lepsius' Egyptology is but a tissue of air-woven fables, and he will be as little likely to surrender himself to any current delusion as a man who has studied astronomy or chemistry. The trouble is, that our scheme of classical education does not provide for any adequate knowledge even of classical subjects. Its energies are entirely devoted during seven or eight years to the imperfect acquirement of two languages which ought to be thoroughly mastered in three or four. No time is left for anything else. We read Aristophanes, and never suspect his divine, soul-stirring humor. We read Demosthenes and remain ignorant of Athenian politics. Depend upon it, if we were taught these things differently, if we were to study the classics so that we should recognize Sulla or Pericles on meeting them, we should less frequently be heard to complain of the uselessness of our 'college lumber.'"

In a previous issue of the CALIFORNIAN, we have made mention of Dr. Bigelow's essay on classical and utilitarian studies, in which the extreme utilitarian ground against "classical rubbish" is taken. Professor Bowen, in a reply to the Doctor's phamphlet, marched direct to the other extreme, and not content with making a vigorous and able defence of the classics, actually went the length of questioning the value of science altogether. Science is purely utilitarian, and not in high and noble way. It does little for a man as a spiritual being. It promotes his physical comfort, gives him steam-ploughs, yeast powders, and innumerable other Yankee inventions. It has enabled us to send messages across the ocean, in so many seconds instead of so many days, and to have our photographs taken. But after all, what real good is there in these things? This is not the precise language of the Professor, but it is a fair and unexaggerated representation of the spirit of it; and this cant of classicality is more repugnant to good sense than even the narrow utilitarianism that rails at "dead languages" and at "book-learning that won't help a man to get a living."

Concerning the value of scientific studies, as a part, but not the whole of a scheme of education, and the correlative value of classical studies, the Nation says:

"They (scientific studies) impart to us skill in classification in terminology, and in the use of hypothesis, accuracy in observation and skill in experiment. They beget in us a wholesome scepticism concerning the all-sufficiency of our mental powers and show us that some things can be done while others cannot, and teach us that there are such things as laws or uniformities of succession in nature which must not, cannot, under any circumstances, be disregarded with impunity. They nourish in us a religious state of mind, inviting us to approach nature and life with trust and not with fear. But more need not be said. We need do no more in behalf of the claims of science than refer to Dr. Youmans' book, where nearly all that can be urged on the subject is most forcibly urged. For our own part, while recognizing most of what is said in the book as an expression of our own ideas and opinions, we still retain an intense feeling of the indispensable value of the classics. Believing, as Mr. Mill does, that there is no reason, except the stupidity of instructors, why classics and the sciences should not both be taught, we hold that they should both be taught. Our earnest recognition of the claims of the one should never blind us to the claims of the other. We are surprised at one little remark in Dr. Youmans' introduction. Having quoted Mr. Mill's address in behalf of scientific studies, he thinks it proper to add that the same vigorous discourse contains a strong argument for the classics. But while, says Mr. Youmans, 'Mr. Mill urges the importance of scientific studies for all, an examination of his argument for the classics will show that it is applicable only to those who, like himself, are professional scholars, and devote their lives to philological, historical, or critical studies.' An examination of Mr. Mill's argument for the classics will, we believe, show that it is as universally applicable as his argument for the sciences. He does not bring forward a single reason why the classics should be studied which does not fit the case of the dry-goods merchant as well as the case of the college professor. Nowhere in his address does he faintly intimate that he is not putting one class of studies upon the same footing as as the other."

Those who feel a strong interest in this important educational question, and would wish to see it presented in all its more important aspects, with great ability, candor, and thoroughness, should read Dr. Youmans' "Culture Demanded by Modern Life," especially the introduction, together with Mr. Mill's St. Andrew's Address. Together, they are almost exhaustive of the subject.

HAZLITT PHOTOGRAPHED.

William Hazlit, the contemporary and associate of Coleridge, Southey, Wordsworth, and Lamb, and who was popularly classified with them as belonging to the "cockney school," is the least known to the readers of this generation. Of the entire group, not in the literal sense a "cockney," being of Irish extraction, and born in Shropshire, Hazlitt defiantly accepted the epithet, and affected to glory in it. "Your true cockney," he said, "is your only true leveler. Let him be as low as he will, he fancies he is as good as anybody else." His reputation as a critic was very great during his life time. He was full of eccentricities, some of which were far from agreeable. The last sketch we have seen of this singular man, is furnished by a writer in a recent number of the London Quarterly, in an article entitled "Charles Lamb, and Some of His Contemporaries."

HIS ARROGANCE.

Of Hazlitt's less amiable idiosyncrasies, the writer in the Quarterly says:

"The faults of Hazlitt were the more disagreeable because the man was one of those warm-blooded creatures whom we wish to like if they will but let us. And though he does his best to prevent our liking him, it is not in his power to prevent any one who knows the English language from admiring. The admiration is uneasy, chequered, qualified, but it is admiration still. If Hazlitt lacked the poetic genius of his two gentler friends, he was gifted with an eloquence more masculine. The fibre of his brain was less fine than theirs, but it was of stronger tissue. He had in early youth cultivated his reasoning faculty with a patient study unknown to those playmates of the muse, and that faculty was sufficiently acute to have achieved him no mean repute in metaphysical speculation, or in the more practical domain of judicial criticism, had it not been constantly obscured and perverted by passions fiercely combative, which, accompanied with an arrogant self-esteem, and a very limited knowledge of the world, too often deprived his judgment of value, because they robbed it of charity and candor. And it was exactly where his knowledge of the world was the most deficient that his passions and his arrogance led him to parade his defect with the loftiest austentation. He delighted in analytical comments on the public characters of his time; and it is difficult to conceive any man of letters with so profound an ignorance, not only of the characters thus superciliously depicted, but of the estimates formed of them by persons the most competent to know."

Hazlitt was no respecter of person, as his "Political Essays," and his critical writings generally, will abundantly show. Of the Duke of Wellington's speeches on Indian affairs, he says:

"We confess those speeches which we have heard appear to us prodigies of physical prowess and intellectual imbecility; the ardor of his natural temperament stimulating and controling the ordinary faculties of his mind; the exuberance of his animal spirits contending with the barrenness of his genius, produce a degree of dull vivacity, of paraded insignificance and impotant energy, which is without any parallel but itself."

Hazlitt's temperament was vehemently aggressive, and he was never so happy or so vigorous as when making a savage attack. Speaking of his intellectual obligations to Coleridge, he says: "I was at that time" (when brought into contact with the poet-philosopher) "dumb, inarticulate, helpless, like a worm by the way-side, crushed, bleeding, lifeless. But now, bursting from the deadly bands

> "That bound them
> With Styx nine times round them," my ideas float on winged words, and as they expand their plumes, catch the golden light of other years. My soul, indeed, has remained in its original bondage, dark, obscure, with longings infinite and unsatisfied; my heart shut up in the prison house of this rude clay, has never found, nor will it find, a heart to speak to; but that my understanding also, did not remain dull and brutish, or at length found a language to express itself, I owe to Coleridge." And yet, after such an acknowledgment as this, he can thus assail the greatest of his intellectual benefactors:

"No one ever yet gave Mr. Coleridge a penny for his thoughts.' * * * * 'He is the secret Tattle of the Press. * * * * He is the dog in the manger of literature; an intellectual Marplot who will neither let anybody else come to a conclusion nor come to one himself.' * * * * * 'He lives in the belief of a perpetual lie, and in affecting to think what he pretends to say,' etc."

And again, in his essay "On the Prose Style of Poets," he thus characterizes the style of Coleridge:

"With bits of tarnished lace and worthless frippery, he assumes a sweeping Oriental costume. * * * * He is swelling and turgid, everlastingly aiming to be greater than his subject, filling his fancy with fumes and vapors in the pangs and throes of miraculous parturition, and bringing forth only stillbirths."

And this dreaded critic was as inconstant in his admiration as he was ferocious in his censure. At one time he was among the most enthusiastic admirers of Wordsworth; yet when the "slashing" fit is on him, he can deal as savagely with him, as with the most empty pretender to the bays, as witness the following:

"The spirit of Jacobin poetry is rank egotism. We know an instance; it is that of a person who founded a school of poetry on sheer humanity, on ideal boys and on mad mothers, and on Simon Lee the old huntsman. The secret of the Jacobin poetry, and the anti-Jacobin politics of this writer is the same. His lyric poetry was a cant of humanity about the commonest people, to level the great with the small, and his political poetry is a cant of loyalty, to level Bonaparte with kings and heriditary imbecility. This person admires nothing that is admirable, feels no interest in anything interesting, no grandeur in anything grand, no beauty in anything beautiful. He tolerates nothing but what he himself creates."

HIS BETTER SELF.

And yet, these critical outbursts do not indicate the real character of the man; and the writer in the Quarterly says, with a rare depth of appreciation:

"But amidst all his intolerant prejudices, and his wild extravagance of apparent hate, there is in Hazlitt from time to time—those times not unfrequent—outbursts or sentiment scarcely surpassed among the writers of our century for tender sweetness, rapid perceptions of truth and beauty in regions of criticism then but sparingly cultured—nay, scarcely discovered—and massive fragments of such composition as no hand of ordinary strength could hew out of the unransacked mines of our native languages.

"Nor is it without a melancholy and softening interest that we detect sometimes, amidst the very lucubrations that most displease the taste by virulent personalities, some excuse for the writer's indulgence of hate in the sorrows of his private life, the mortifications of his literary career; and imagine that we can trace that bitterness of spirit which taints the current flow of his mind to its springs in disappointed affection and baffled aspiration. For it is one of the peculiarities in the egotism of this writer to launch into savage diatribes on the faults to which his acute self consciousness made him aware that he was most subjected. He would insist on the virtue of a courtesy, denounce the vituperation which comes from envy at another's success, call before him the phantom of his own mind, arraign it, and condemn. Surely there is something of the soured philanthropy of Alceste in the burst of wild declamation with which he concludes his ironical Essay 'On the pleasure of Hating:'

"'Mistaken as I have been in my public and private hopes, calculating wrong; always disappointed where I placed most reliance; the dupe of friendship and the fool of love, have I not reason to hate and despise myself? Indeed I do; and chiefly for not having hated and despised the world enough.'

"This is not the writing of a cynicle hate, but of a passionate despair; and, unless we mistake, of such despair as is never wrung from a strong man except where the heart is constitutionally warm and the aspirations originally noble. Such a despair the best and the greatest have conceived when, walking in the Valley of Shadow, they forget that the visibility of shadow is the evidence of light."

MISCELLANY.

MR. JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL will publish a new volume of poems in the Autumn.

MRS. HARRIET BEECHER STOWE has so nearly completed as to have sent to the printer portions of a new work, which is described as a "chronicle of old-time folks in a New England village, fifty or sixty years ago."

MR. BAYARD TAYLOR is employing his leisure time in Germany upon his translation of Gœthe's Faust and a serial entitled The By-Ways of Europe, which is to appear in the Atlantic Monthly.

PROF. AGASSIZ'S Journey in Brazil is completed and in the printer's hands, and its author is engaged in superintending its illustration.

WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT, the poet, has arrived home, from his late journey in Europe.

HOLME'S "Guardian Angel," now running through the Atlantic Monthly, will be publiished in a volume, in November.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON is preserving the papers of his illustrious father, "The Great Duke," by committing them to type, of which, however, but three impressions will be made, and to these no general access will be allowed.

ROBERT BUCHANAN has in press "North Coast Poems," and a volume of prose, entitled "David Gray and other Personal Papers."

FEMALE SECRET SOCIETIES.

BY JOHN QUILL.

"Mr. Wilkins you are very unreasonable."

"No, I'm not, Mrs. Wilkins; no, I'm not. I'm a perfectly reasonable man, bnt your ontrageons conduct will deprive me of reason if it ain't checked. I shall go mad with rage and mortification. Bnt it's got to be stopped. I'm the master of this house, and—look at me, Mrs. Wilkins—I swear a frightful oath, that if you don't give up that secret society, I'll—I'll—raise a riot. I will, by George!"

"But you don't understand, Mr. Wilk——"

"Yes, I do understand it. I nnderstand that you and a lot of other old hens get together and cackle every Tuesday night, down there in a room, and talk scandal and blackguard your neighbors, and call yourselves 'The Society of the Holy Danghters of Tabitha." Who in the duse was Tabitha, anyhow? Some old second rate washerwoman, I expect, and here yon, the wife of a respectable man like me, want to go down and call yonrself her daughter, and associate with a lot of old women."

"Mr. Wilkins, I——"

"And carry on your tomfoolery where nobody can see you. I tell you it ain't decent, and it shan't be done. I'll put a stop to it. I'll go down and see the Mayor, and have the place torn ont by the police. Secret society! Pshaw! I'd just like to see a secret society that had women belonging to it. Why yon might just as well go out and stand on the pavement with a fire horn and holler out what you've got to say at once, as to tell it to a lot of old women."

"Wilkins, what do you mean? I'll——"

"A lot of women, who could no more help circulating any facts around the neighborhood than they could help snuffing. That's so, and I say you shan't be running around, gabbling among my friends, and giving them the pass-word. There's Smith's wife, she thinks you're crazy, because you came a gripping around her like some first-class lunatic, and Smith advised me to have you put in the asylum——"

"What an awful story!"

"Because he said he was afraid you'll murder some of your own children. I won't have it any longer. I'm tired of it. My offspring shan't be polluted by such wickedness. Here you ought to be teaching them Christianity, aud displaying a mother's love, instead of which I saw you a practicing the grip for nearly two honrs, the other day, on the baby's off leg, and making all kinds of passes before it's face until the child's been cross-eyed for a week, and all along of your infernal foolishness. Why don't you practice on me? Why don't you show me your grips? Why, because you're afraid to. Yon know I won't stand any of your nonsense, and so you go and try to ruin a poor innocent child that never did you any harm, and who ought to be drawing sustenance from the maternal fonnt, instead of being poisoned with that stuff in the bottle with the gum nozzel."

"Wilkins, you talk like a fool."

"And there's Bucephalus Alexander, hasn't he gone and formed a secret society with William Henry and Amelia Matilda? And didn't they try to initiate Holofernes Montgomery into it yesterday, by making him walk up a rocky pathway made out of old starch-boxes, so that he fell down and like to have knocked his knee-cap into a thousand pieces; while they blindfolded Breckenridge Augustus, and made him slide down a board that they called "the mysterious precipice,'" into the bath-tub, so he tore the whole hide off him, and got his best jacket wet, while Bucephalus Alexander pretended to give Mary Jane the grip, and squeezed her hand so that she's got three fingers out of joint, and can't play the piano for a month, and says she's very likely crippled for life? I tell yon I won't have it. Yon may go to destruction as quick as you like, but my innocent children shan't; so don't you go to that secret society again, now mind me."

"But Wilk——"

"Now it's perfectly nseless to 'but' me. I tell you I won't have it. No woman that belongs to me shall go down and associate with a lot of pagans, for that's what they are. I know them; I know they carry on frightful orgies there every night, and have demon dances like the Black Crook, and bow down before some old wooden-headed, slab-sided idol, and sacrifice little children to it, and tear their clothes and rip them np, and behave in the most scandalous and outrageous manner. Mrs. Wilkins, and do you suppose I'm going to have that? Do you snppose I'm going to stand placidly by and pay millinery bills while my wife is bowing down to wood and stone, and making a perfectly ridiculons and wicked old clam of herself? Not mnch, I ain't. I'm not such a fool; yon can bet on that."

"Mr. Wilkins, there's not a word of truth——"

"O you needn't deny it; I know all about it. Didn't I hear yon talking to that old Mrs. Grimes last night, and telling her that you thought the Great High Priestess was a 'nasty s d that you thonght 'there was no use of her putting on airs, becanse she carried the holy rag and mixed the sacred lemonade?' Sacred lemonades are al very well, but you don't suppose I believe that, do you? That accounts for where my old Irish whisky has been going, and for your coming home late on Tuesday nights with the hiccups, and always saying, you felt faint. It's a shame and disgrace, but you don't impose on me. I heard old Grimes talking about the blessed gingerbread——"

"That's not so, Mr. Wilk——"

"Gingerbread, and saying that she thought she would have green tea next time, when the Great High Priestess would decide on the pass-word for the month; and how, in her opinion, it would be better to have the words 'Beauty and Peace' said three times slowly, while you twiddle your thumbs and wink twice with your right eye. Beauty and Peace! the idea of a parcel of old mummies——"

"Mr. Wilk——"

"A parcel of old shriveled-up mummies, who look more like so many chunks of dried beef than human beings, talking about beauty! Why you know about as much about beauty as a speckled jackass does about four dollars a week; and as for peace, in my opinion, you'd better begin that at home. I want peace—I want quiet, you're the person who robs me of it, and I say that there's got to be a change or I'll die."

"Ain't you ashamed of——"

"Die in the very bloom of my youth and beauty; be cut down like grass, and all because you run around and behave like a demnition maniac, and associate with disreptutable people, and worship false gods, and carry on like mad, and rip your things up, and neglect your family and your business at home. It's perfectly scandalous, and must be stopped, by George. You hear me swear it! By George, I say."

"Well, you don't neglect one portion of the family, anyhow."

"What?"

"I say one member of the family ain't neglected by you."

"Why, what do you mean, Mrs. Wilkins?"

"You needn't preach to me about decency after your vile behavior."

"What's the matter with you, anyway? Why don't you talk sensible, and say what you mean?"

"You ought to be ashamed of yourself, and you the father of a family."

"Oh, spill out what you know, and then stop your clatter."

"Well, then, Mr. Wilkins, I think it's outrageous in you to lay there and talk to me the way you do, when it's only the day before yesterday that I saw you kiss our hired girl on the back stairs. You'll break my heart—yes, you will."

"Well, I hope I may be——Mrs. Wilkins, don't cry. It ain't so—it ain't, by George. Oh, stop off your waterworks. I didn't mean it. Sarah Ann—Sarah Ann, never mind. Oh, cry, then, cry—I don't care a cuss, you ain't worth bothering with."

And Wilkins went out and slammed the door. But he made it up in the morning, for I heard him pitching into Mrs. Wilkins for letting the baby swallow the gum ring.—Philadelphia Sunday Transcript.

THE ROCKY MOUNTAINS.

There is something desolate, cold and cheerless suggested by the words Rocky Mountains. As the mountains are approached the idea is by no means expelled; the mountains look black and dismal, and all the darker from the contrast of the pure and glittering snow that covers the everlasting peaks. But upon approaching their base and entering into the foot-hills, the dark masses assume the form and color of living nature, and one is struck with the richness in trees, apparently all pine. The boundless forests seem sufficient to snpply the wants of a nation. Rich and luxuriant grasses soon come into view; flowers in great variety, and of hues bright and profuse, gladden the eye on every side, when the dark illusion fades away, and the stranger feels that despite the wild and rugged peaks, even in the very midst of rough upheavels and fantastic overturning, there appear spots of rich verdure that might be made into luxuriant gardens. Along the gulch, and even on the summits, there is a rich black soil frequently many feet in depth, which, under the skillful manipulation of man, would, in this electric climate, complete with California in luxuriousness of production, while the many streams that ooze out on every side afford the most ample means of irrigations. While with our small population we are almost dependent on the valley for the common products of the kitchen garden, we have yet within a circuit of three miles around Central City enough unsurpassed rich soil to supply a population of 20,000 persons, and ready meams of building houses and fenses on the spot. In fact, the using of the loose stones for that purpose would uncover more soil than could readily be made available for profitable use.—Colorado Times.

"Le Meunier's" poem will appear in the next issue of THE CALIFORNIAN.

TEAM BATHS FOR ONE DOLLAR, at Dr. Bourne's, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Notice is received that this is the only establishment which excludes all loathsome diseases and improper persons.

BENEFIT OF SIGNOR MANCUSI.—On Wednesday evening next, Signor Mancusi, who has displayed so much talent in Crispino é la Comare, rivaling the celebrated Ronconi, and whose "Nelusko" in L'Africaine, was pronounced "perfect" by our best critics, will take a benefit at the American Theatre. The favorite opera of L'Eliser d'Amore will be giveu. Siguor Mancusi beiug assisted by Signora Brambilla and Signor Carmini Morley who have kindly volunteered. Had it not been for the presence of Signor Mancusi in this city, our citizens would probably not have enjoyed the pleasure of the late opera season, and the careful manner in which he sings the music of the roles in which he appears, eutitles him to respect and substantial appreciation from the public.

AN OREGON TRADITION—In olden times, on the North Pacific coast, there was a story often told among the early settlers of Oregon, Washingtou Territory and Vancouver's Island, that some uncivilized Indian aborigines of Washington Territory had paddled their way coastwise in a canoe as far as Portland, in Oregon, up through the ugly Columbia river, and that in progress forward they met with, on the banks of the river, partially imbedded in the mnd, the somewhat broken remains of a Chinese junk. This astonished the Indians, who regarded themselves the sole lords of creation, while it afterward excited the curiosity and spirit of inquiry of such few white men as were then in these distant and comparatively unknown regions of the earth. The finding of the Chinese junk is still a matter of tradition among the Indian tribes who inhabit these regions, and is freely spoken of by the American and Europeau population, and the conclusion come to is, that at some far off period of the world's existence the Chinese—always enterprising people—sent an expedition northward, which became a prey to pittiless storms that are so often to be encountered in the Columbia river. Certain it is at all events, the junk was found in the Columbia, and it is only reasonable to conclude that it came from China.

THE SAN JOSE SILK FACTORY.—It will be seen by reference to the doings of the Industrial Immigration Association of San Francisco that the silk factory has enlisted the Association in its interest, and that it has already begun the work of practical relief by liberal subscriptions to the stock of the factory. In all enterprises of this kind, in every effort to build up and encourage home industry and manufactnres, Mr. Thomas Mooney, of San Francisco, exhibits a degree of enlightened forecaste, and a just appreciation of results, and of the duties, as a man of wealth, he owes to society, far in advance of any man on the Pacific coast. In this respect, he is doing as much or more than his very distinguished countryman, Matthew Carey, did for American manufactures in the early days of of American manufacturing enterprise and industry in the Atlantic States. Everything we have seen from Mr. Mooney has impressed us with the highest respect for him. He is not niggard in his contributions and subscriptions when a public good is to be accomplished. His mind is large, accurate and eminently utilitarian, and seems animated by a love of promoting all useful enterprises. Such a man deserves and will acquire the highest public regard, The San Jose Silk Factory, under such auspices, aided by the skill and enthusiasm of Messrs. Newman and Prevost, will soon be a success and a profitable one.—San Jose Patriot.

LITTLE SAVINGS.—Let a man who has hitherto spent his money as soon as he has received it and had no thought for the morrow, once commence to save money in ever such small sums, and he will find the habit grow on him. A most valuable institution will be opened very shortly in this city, one which will do much toward encouraging habits of prudence with regard to money in our citizens who are not blessed with too much. The City Bank of Savings Loan and Discount, No. 627 Sacramento street, corner of Webb, will commence business on Tuesday, the 15th inst., and will then be ready to receive deposits, and make loans and discounts. This bank is under the management of responsible men, and the small savings of the careful mechanic and laborer will be safe with them.

CUTTER'S WHISKY.—This well-known brand of whisky that has stood the test of years in California for its superiority to all other brands, is still to be had in spite of the spurious articles peddled throughout the State. Henry M. Cutter is the agent, and son of the celebrated distiller of Old Bourbon Whisky, of Bourbon County, Kentucky—agent, No. 620 Front street. The trade can rely on getting the genuine article by ordering it from the above agency, put up in cases or in the original packages. The Pacific Mail Steamship and other Steamship Companies, the druggists, groceries, and the trade, find Cutter's Old Bourbon Whisky to be the genuine article for the health of passengers, medicinal and family uses

SAN FRANCISCO FASHIONS.—In no part of the world probably do ladies dress with more taste than in San Francisco. Most certainly there are few cities in the world of equal size which can boast such a store as the cloak house of Meyer Jonasson & Co., on Montgomery street, opposite the Lick House. Here can be found cloaks of every imaginable style. The Fall and Winter fashions have arrived, and this large firm has its numerous employees busily occupied in filling ordors. There is one style of cloak to be seen at this establishment which is peculiarly San Franciscan in character, and bids fair to become the most popular cloak of many a season.

RIVALRY IN TRADE.—The shoe dealers are in quite an excited state, in consequence of the very low prices at which Messrs. Holcombe & Kast are disposing of their stock. As they have to move and make room for the widening of Kearny street, now is the time for all to secure a good article at a reasonable price. A few dollars used in this manner, will procure many necessary articles of housekeeping, and we cordially reccommend this firm to the favorable consideration of the public.

OCTOBER.

Solemn, yet beautiful to view,
Month of my heart, thou dawnest here,
With sere and faded leaves to strew
The Summer's melancholy bier.
The moaning of thy winds I hear,
As the red sunset dies afar,
And bars of purple clouds appear,
Obscuring every western star.

Thou solemn month! I hear thy voice,
It tells my soul of other days,
When but to live was to rejoice,
When earth was lovely to my gaze.
O, visions bright! O, blessed hours!
Where are those living raptures now?
I ask my spirit's wearied powers,
I ask my pale and fevered brow.

Alas! for Time and Death and Care,
With gloom about our way that fling
Like clouds in August's gusty air,
The burial pageant of the Spring!
The dreams that each succeeding year,
Seemed bathed in hues of living pride,
At last, like withered leaves appear,
And sleep in darkness, side by side.

CURIOSITIES OF FRENCH DUELING.

ACCORDING to some authors, dueling is of the very highest antiquity, its origin being ascribed to Cain, in whose invitation to his brother, as given in the French translation, "Let us go forth," they profess to discover the exact terms of the cartel. France, no doubt, borrowed the custom directly from Germany, where first we find the duel regarded as an appeal to Heaven. Divested of its religious character, the duel becomes the judicial combat and the wager of battle, till, losing the sanction of the law, it arrives at its modern position as simply an "affair of honor."

The judicial combat became rare in France after the fourteenth century; during a period of one hundred years, only four examples of it are found. A great blow was given to it in 1835 by the unfortunate result of a duel fought in the presence of Charles VI. and all the court: the judgment of God, as it was impiously called, proved unfavorable to a man who, accused of a crime, protested his innocence, and was thereupon compelled to take his part in a duel ordered by the parliament. Being conquered, he was hung on the gallows, which formed a part of the preparations of the battle-field; but some time afterward, another man declared himself guilty of the crime which had led to the duel. This was, in fact, the end of the judicial combat. Henceforth, the parliaments systematically refused to lend their sanction to these appeals; and the duel became simply a question of obtaining "satisfaction" for wounded honor.

Royalty, however, continued to preside at hostile meetings, which, indeed, were only permitted on formal demand to the King. The sceptre thrown into the arena was the signal for discontinuing the combat; and the most infuriated champion did not afterward dare for his life to strike a blow.

Dueling had got to such a height in 1566 it was classed among the worst crimes, and made punishable with death. But this severity only gave to the practice the sweetness of forbidden fruit. Duels were fought on the slightest pretexts, and where they were wanting, on none. In less than twenty years, eight thousand pardons had been granted to gentlemen who had killed their adversaries. One day, two duelists crossing the Seine for the purpose of fighting, see others hunting about for boats in which to follow and prevent the combat. They hasten their boatmen, and, scarce on shore, they cry out in chorus: "Quick! quick! they're coming to separate us. A few passes, and they both fall dead. At another time, a madman named De Gensac persists in fighting two men at once, and to those who try to stop him, he exclaims: "What! have you never seen one man against two? The histories are full of it. Come on both! I'll get myself in the chronicles!" And, in truth, it was almost worth while to have one's exploits recounted in the deliciously naïve language of Brantome. Witness his reflection on a fight, three against three: "Some say that M. le Baron de Biron, more courageous and quick of hand, killed his man the first, and went to the help of the others; in which he did right well, and showed that with his valor he had no small judgment and foresight!" Bussy d'Amboise, who took advantage of the massacre of St. Bartholomew to kill a relation with whom he was at law, had, before this exploit, signalized himself as a duelist. A gentleman named St. Phal called his attention to some X's in a piece of embroidery; Bussy, to bring on a duel, swore they were Y's. On this weighty subject there came off a six on each side. Bussy was wounded, but soon sent another challenge, and even had the audacity to offer battle to the captain of the King's Guards, sent to stop this second fight. It needed the intervention of the King and his brother to put an end to this almost interminable quarral.

The game went bravely on: from 1589 to 1608, eight thousand duelists fell; and King Henry IV. would have been only too glad to take his share of the work. "If I were only your friend," he wrote to Duplessis Mornay, "and not your King, there is no sword which would more readily come out of its scabbard for you than mine." In this reign, Lagarde Valon had, by his exploits awakened the envy of another cut-throat, named Bazanez, who accordingly sent to his rival a hat, threatening to come and take it and the new wearer's life at the same time. Lagarde wore the hat, and went about seeking Bazanez, whom he did not know by sight. Finding one another at last, the two bravos went to work. A tremendous blow fell right on the top of Bazanez's head—in vain: the skull was so hard that the sword glanced off. The second blow had more effect. "There's for the hat," said Lagarde "and there for the feather; and here for the hand." Bazanez; was fast losing blood, but was not done for yet. He rushed on his man, and by main force knocked him down. "Beg for your life!" he cried, as one after the other he dealt Lagarde fourteen blows between the neck and the waist. "No! no!" cried Lagarde at each stroke, and with a desperate effort he bit off half the chin of Bazanez, and knocked in the back of his head with the pommel of his sword. Wonderful to relate, both survived—one to die some years later in an ambuscade, the other to become the terror of the country into which he withdrew.

The rage for combats at last got too much even for the easy King, and a new edict of great severity was issued; but the fighting went on all the same, and the King shut his eyes. The mania even increased in the reign of Louis XIII. We read of two men who get into a hogshead, and there hack one another to pieces with knives. Two others, on a simple question of precedence, clasp the left hands, and poinard each other. At length, after law upon law, came out the celebrated edict of 1626, of which such use was to be made by Richelieu. François to Montmorency, Count of Bonteville, the most notorious duelist of that day, could never hear it said of a man that was brave without at once going off to challenge him. He had fought more than twenty duels. To defy the new edict, he fixed on the Place Royale, at three o'clock in the afternoon, as the place and time of what was to be his last combat. Richelieu insisted on his execution: "We must cut the throats of these duelists or of your majesty's edicts;" so Bonteville died, in spite of all intercession. Edicts and he could, indeed, not well live together. Condemned to death by default before this, he had caused the proclamation to be torn down by force, and pursuit getting hot, had made for the frontier with an escort of two hundred men.

Severe as Richelieu was on dueling grandees, he appears, from the chroniclea, to have been very tolerent of combats among the smaller fry. The Baron d'Aapremont, for example, almost fought three duels in a single day. Beginning in the morning, he killed an adversary, who only contrived to pink him in the leg. Troubled by this wound, the Baron, unable to eat at table, amused himself by throwing at his friends pellets of bread, one of which chanced to strike a gentleman, who considered that he had thereby received an affront. Having run this second adversary through the arm, the Baron was enlisted as a second in a third duel, which, however, was stopped. The Chevalier d'Andrieux was another bravo of the same stamp. At thirty years of age, he had killed seventy-two men. Preparing for another duel, "Chevalier," said his adversary, "you will be the tenth man that I have killed!" "And you my seventy-third!', replied the Chevalier, whom the result proved to be in the right.

This humorous gentleman was in the habit of promising to his disarmed adversaries their lives if they would forswear their hopes of salvation; this done, he would cut their throats, that, as he said, he might have the pleasure of killing them body and soul.

Ludovic de Piles and his brother were journeying toward Paris, and arriving at Valence, entered an inn, and asked for supper. The landlord declared that he had only eggs and cheese. "For whom, then, is that spit turning?" "For four officers." "Go and ask them to allow us to join them." This request met with a prompt refusal. Ludovic and his brother supped wretchedly, and went to bed in a room divided from that of the officers by a thin partition only. Ludovic, enraged at the treatment he had met with, lay wide awake, and heard jests at the expense of the pair who had fared so ill. In the morning, the two brothers started betimes, but before they had gone a league, "I've left my purse behind," cried Ludovic. "Do you go on; I shall come up with you by dinner-time." Returning to Valence, he went straight to the room of the officers. "Gentlemen," said he, "I am one of the two travelers with whom you refused to share your supper. You had a right to do this, but not to make your jokes upon us. I don't like it, and I ask satisfaction of all you." One after another, the four officers fall, and Ludovic, rejoining his brother, rejoices that he has recovered his purse. Not a word of the duels, of which the brother hears for the first time of Cardinal Mazarin, who advises him to keep Ludovic out of the way.

Cyrano de Bergerac made a point of always holding himself in readiness to act as second to whomsoever might need his services. He was a most skillful swordsman, but was blessed by nature with so long a nose, that all his adroitness could that I met them without charging them." And charge she did, for the last time, for her adversaries had the bad taste to kill her.

In the gallery of femmes vaillantes, La Beaupré holds a foremost place. After an exchange of strong language with La des Urlis, she rushed away, and came back, bringing two swords. Des Urlis took one, thinking no ill; but La Beaupré pressed her hard, wounded her in the neck, and would certainly have killed her, had not timely help come.

Another singular affair was the duel between the Marquise de Nesle and the Comtesse de Polignac, in the Bois de Boulogne. The former proposed pistols; the Countess accepted, and generously gave her adversary the first shot. The Marquise fired, and missed, breaking a branch from a tree. "Anger makes the hand shake," was the cool comment of the Countess, who fired, and carried away the tip of her adversary's ear.

Returning to male duelists, we light on M. de Sainte-Foix, a terribly quarrelsome gentleman, who retired from the army, and took to literature, without abandoning his warlike habits. Here is a specimen of his manner of whiling away an idle hour. He was one day in the Café Procope, when one of the King's Guard entered and ordered a cup of coffee and a roll, adding in an undertone to himself: "That will do for my dinner." "You're making a miserable dinner," said Sainte Foix, addressing him. He repeated this several times, till at last the guardsman got angry; a fight ensued, and Sainte-Foix was wounded. "It's all one," he said; "a roll and a cup of coffee are a wretched dinner."

Two officers of the Guards had a quarrel, which ended in a blow. The aggrieved person plastered on his cheek a piece of taffeta, the size of the palm of his hand, and then politely invited the giver of the blow to accompany him to a quiet spot. The result of this promenade was, that the wearer of the taffeta gave his adversary a wound bad enough to lay him up for two months. Before leaving the ground, he quietly drew from his pocket a pair of scissors, and just cut off from the piece of stuff a little circle. The wounded man was beginning to get about, when a visitor was announced by the servant. "It is a gentleman who wears a piece of taffeta on his face; he says that you expect him." "O, ah; just tell him I'll come down." Another combat ends with the same fortune, and the scissors are again brought into play. These duels went on with the requisite intervals, till at last the taffeta had decreased almost to a point. "I'm at the end of my piece," said the wearer C. to T., whose body was a mass of scars, "and you're at the end of your troubles." And so he was, for in the last duel, preluded by this little address, T. was killed.

The great revolution so absorbed men's minds, that eccentric duels disappear for a while. Except that some are remarkable from the presence of political notabilities, there are few which would interest the reader. Combats became more frequent under the Empire, though an officer who was frequently engaged in duels was certain to earn the profound contempt of Napoleon. From the mass of uninteresting duels, let us pick out one worthy of mention, if only from the fact that it came to an end in 1813, after a duration of nineteen years. Fournier, a captain of hussars, and a most inveterate duelist, had, without provocation, called out and killed at Strasbourg a young man named Blumm, the only support of a large family. Fournier's skill was so great that this affair was regarded as little better than murder. On the evening of Blumm's burial, General Morean gave a ball, and as it was suspected that Fournier would present himself, orders were given to Captain Dupont to refuse him admittance. The consequence was that Dupont received a challenge, which he gladly accepted, in the hope of at last chastising the insolence of a hardened cut-throat. Fournier fell wounded. "The first point to you," he exclaimed. "Then you mean to go on again?" "Yes; and before long, I hope."

A month later, it was Dupont's turn to be wounded, not save it from an occasional cut. These multiplied in the immense number of duels he fought, till his notched nose became quite a curiosity—one, however, which it was dangerous to look at too closely: a dozen men paid with their lives for a simple inspection of the monstrous and disfigured cartilage. One of his exploits was to throw himself into the midst of a band of assassins, of whom he killed two and wounded seven, while the rest took to flight.

The mania for duels was not confined to the sterner sex; witness the exploits of the better-half of Chateau-Gay de Murat. This virago used to appear on horseback in great boots, with her petticoats tucked up, and carrying a sword at her side, and pistols at her saddle-bow. Having a bone to pick with a M. Codieres, she called him out. He "came up smiling," and played about with his sword, till he found that the lady was seriously bent on sending him to the ancestral vault. Changing tactics, he pressed her so hard, avoiding wounds, that at last she dropped to the ground through sheer fatigue, and had to cry for quarter. Quarreling afterward with some gentlemen, she happened to meet them at the chase, and made preparations to charge. Her groom cried out: "Come off, madam; come off; they are three against one." "Never mind," quoth the dame; "no one shall say Fournier proposed pistols; but Dupont refused to accept a weapon which would give his adversary all the advantage. Fournier was so skillful with the pistol, that frequently, as the men of his regiment passed on horseback at a gallop smoking, he would, with a bullet, knock the pipes out of their mouths. The two were so nearly equal with the sword that the contest seemed interminable; but they resolved to persevere till one or the other should admit himself beaten. To regulate their combats, the terms of an agreement were come to: "1. Whenever Dupont and Fournier shall be within thirty leagues of one another, each shall go half way, in order that they may meet sword in hand. 2. If one of the two contracting parties should be prevented by his military duty, he who is free shall be bound to journey the whole distance, in order that the rules of the service and the requirements of the present treaty may be made to harmonize. 3. No excuses shall be accepted save those arising from military duties. 4. The present treaty being concluded in good faith, there can be no departure from conditions agreed on by the parties."

The agreement was religiously adhered to, and the warmest friendship could not have created in the two officers a more eager desire to avail themselves of every opportunity to meet. "My dear friend," wrote one of these eccentric combatants, "I shall be at Strasbourg on the 5th of November, about noon. Wait for me at the Hotel des Postes. We'll just have a touch at one another." Every now and then, the advancement of one or the other, would interpose delay. This obstacle removed, Fournier (let us say) would write thus: "My dear Dupont, I learn that the Emperor, recognizing your deserts, has just made you a General. Accept my sincere congratulations on a promotion which is only what you deserve. Your nomination is a double source of joy to me. On your account, I rejoice, and on my own also, for your promotion will give us the opportunitv of an early meeting." At last they are both Generals, but the combats go on. At one time, Dupont runs Fournier through the neck, and pins him to a wall, just like a butterfly in a case, but dares not change his position, as, if he does, Fournier can run him through. There they remain till their noise attracts the attention of some officers, who seperate them. Dupont at last began to get weary of this endless contest; he was thinking of marrying, but must first settle with Fournier. Hunting him up, he proposed to finish up with pistols. To equalize the chances, it was decided that the combat should come off in a little wood. Accordingly, on the appointed day, the last act opened Advancing warily, the two at last caught a glimpse of one another. Each immediately took refuge behind a tree. Dupont, inferior in skill, had recourse to artifice. He quietly lifted up his coat-tail, and pushed it beyond the tree; a ball whizzed through it immediately. A few minutes later, the mouth of his pistol appeared on the other side of the tree, while, at the same time, just a corner of the hat projected, as if the wearer were peeping out to take aim. In a moment, a ball carried the hat away among the bushes. "Your life is in my hands," said Dupont; "but I won't take it." "As you like," said Fournier. "Only mind," continued the victor, "I reserve my right to put a couple of balls into your head whenever I like; so don't come near me." And thus ended this long quarrel.

On the author of the Comte de Pontécoulant, we give the following: Colonel Barbier-Dufai, a noted duelist, insulted Raoul X——, a young soldier, solely with the intention of provoking him to a duel. Finding, however, that Raoul was a mere boy, a fact disguised by his large statue, the fighting Colonel made excuses, and wished to withdraw. Raoul refused to consent to this course, and swords were drawn. The disparity of the combatants was so great, that the Colonel, after four times disabling his adversary, proposed that some other mode of fighting should be found. It was impossible to use pistols in the street; what was to be done? At this moment, the rumble of a hackney-coach was heard, and Dufai found the wished for solution, "Stop this cab," he said to his seconds, "and run and exchange these swords for a pair of daggers of equal length." "This is what I propose," he added to Raoul: "we will get into the coach, armed each with a dagger, and bound to one another, with our right arm only free; then let the doors be shut, and the coach go twice round the Place du Carrousel." Raoul accepted; the proposed arrangements were made; and, at a signal, the cab started, two seconds on the box seat, the other two behind. As the horses, driven by the seconds, dashed round at a pace unequalled in the history of hackney-coaches, one cry was heard, then a second, then all within was still. The journey finished, the seconds rushed to the doors, and, from a pool of blood, drew out the combatants. Raoul was dead; the Colonel, pierced with wounds, and with his face torn by Raoul's teeth, yet managed to survive.

From the Annual Register also we give particulars of the following duel, of which, as we have found no mention of it in the French histories, we are inclined to think that it may perhaps be no more the record of an actual encounter than the affair of Raoul X——(we have grave doubts as to the reality of personages designated by this initial in French anecdotes) and Dufai. The quarrel was between M. de Grandpre and M. le Pique, and the combat came off at, or perhaps we should say above, Paris in May, 1808. "Being both men of elevated minds, they agreed to fight in balloons, and in order to give time for their preparation, it was determined that the duel should take place on that day month. Accordingly, on the third of May, the parties met at a field adjoining the Tuilleries, where their respective balloons were ready to receive them. Each attended by a second, ascended his car, loaded with blunderbusses, as pistols could not be expected to be efficient in their probable situations. A great multitude attended, hearing of the balloons, but little dreaming of their purpose; the Parisians merely looked for the novelty of a baloon-race. At nine o'clock the cords were cut, and the balloons ascended majestically admidst the shouts of the spectators. The wind was moderate, blowing from the north-northwest, and they kept, as far as could be judged, within about eighty yards of each other. When they had mounted to the height of about nine hundred yards, M. le Pique fired his piece ineffectually; almost immediately afterwards, the fire was returned by M. Grandpre, and penetrated his adversary's balloon, the consequence of which was its rapid descent, and M. le Pique and his second were both dashed to pieces on a house-top, over which the balloon fell. The victorious Grandpre then mounted aloft in the grandest style, and descended safe with his second, about seven leagues from the spot of ascension."

It is hard to doubt, we confess, after the natural touch, "wind moderate, blowing from the north-northwest." Surely the force of dueling can no further go; so here, in spite of the temptation offered by numerous anecdotes of more recent duels, we conclude our article.—Histoire Anecdotique du Duel, by M. Colombey.

A WOMAN'S STRATAGEM.

My lover was the noblest man of all:
Of many a noble soul in Padua
The bravest and the noblest. Who like him
Spoke words that fired the hearer when he heard—
Did deeds that wrung the praises from his foes,
Ay, and their envy too? For so it chanced,
Two factions tore the state with mortal feud,
Malice and murder, not a man went forth
But kept his eyes astrain, his hands alert,
His poniard sharply pointed. As for me
(Like poor Giulietta of the Capulets,)
My lover was the marked and special foe,
The hatred of the house that gave me birth:
Dear Gesu, how they hated! Yet by stealth
We kept a tryst or two. They heard of it!
Trust me, in Padua, if a mouse creep forth
At midnight, keep his tryst and tumble back
In the small hours of the morning, not a soul
Next day but hears it in the market-place.
This roused their vengeance, and to make it sure
They gave my hand—confirmed it with an oath—
To Agostino, whom I knew right well
To be both base and treacherous, loved of none,
Or man or woman, Thus the matter stood.
One day the priests came to me, and began
To argue. Have you never heard a priest
Argue? Maria, how my flesh did creep!
I can't remember half the things they said,
So subtly were they spoken! but at length—
You see, I am a mere child still!—it seemed Almost a virtue to be vile: almost
A vice to shun the villainy they proposed.
So, to be brief, I lent myself at last
(They pledged God's favor for it!) and agreed
To bring Giovanni to a rendezvous
That very night beneath the palace walls,
Under the lime trees. There—be being secure
(As not foreboding falseness from a soul
He had taken to swear his oaths by)—all the while
Three trusty witnesses with ears aprick
In the lime trees—I, for my part, was to draw
His plots and purposes from him, word by word.
I undertook the business. Could I stand
Out and refuse their bidding—three such priests,
Backed by our Mother Church? I laid my plans
Calmly and warily—What's that you say?
Just hear the rest of the story. So the hour
Came round too quickly; and I took my place
At the time appointed, Father Angelo
Perched slyly in angle of the wall
To watch us. Punctual to a fault he came Close muffled as I warned him, with his face
Hid from their curious gaze. He cast his arms
About me, strained me closely, and—just then
The moon peeped round the corner of a cloud,
And caught us—how I blushed! He held me tight,
Spite of the moon, and murmured in my ear
Words—how should I remember?—lover's words,
That mean much or nothing. Do you think
I marked them, with my bravos overhead,
Biting their sharp stilletoes with their teeth
To keep the laughter in? I paused awhile,
You'll say I shrunk to call them? Next I drew
His ear down close to hear me, and—perhaps—
It may be—once—one little kiss: you see
His face just touched! I scarcely think I kissed!
We'll say his cheek kissed me. And then he spoke
In whispers. Trust me, they had heard enough
Of love! So then I set me to my task,
Drew his secret from him word by word.
He poured his tale out, as a man that pours
The best flask in his cellar for his friend
To pledge him with before they say Addio.
Why not? we said Addio, for were not these
The last farewells between us, ere his soul
'Scaped from my hands to God's? I raised my voice,
And spoke that they might hear me: "Is this all?
All—every word of the story?" Thereupon,
Sans ceremony, down my bravoes dropped,
Like three ripe peaches dropping from the wall,
And while his answer withered on his lips
(Did he suspect me false then?)—one, two, three,
They stabbed him! You may fancy how I screamed!
They stabbed him twice again to make all sure,
Then left me with my dead. I think one tear
Escaped me—one was genuine, as I sat
Wailing my fate. But up the Padre came,
And took me to confession. "Is he dead?"
His voice unshaken (as befits the voice
Of one who served his mistress—that's the Church!)
"Ay, dead, dead, dead!" I answered with a groan.
So to confession. All my lover's tale
I told him—plot and counterplot—as, thus
Giovanni purposed—thus Giuseppa swore—
And thus was Giulio's counsel. Then he stood
And gave me absolution: and I saw
A light was in his eyes, of triumph won,
And vengeance close at hand. But as for me,
I think mine eye was bright—I know my heart
Laughed inwardly, albeit my body shook,
As shook those lime-trees when the moon stole forth
And caught us kissing. So I got me home,
And ere the quick sun's earliest beams had touched
The top vanes of the churches, we were safe;
My lover, still the noblest man of men—
Giovanni and I!
You guess the rest of the tale?
'Twas Agostino that was kissing me
Under the lime-trees. I had spread my nets
Warily, promising I know not what
Sweet things, and luring him with honeyed lies.
(Leave a woman alone for that!) Poor fool.
I pitied him; but what was I to do?
I had but two to choose from, so I chose
Giovanni, and hold him in Verona's walls
Safe to this day, uomo degli uomini!

Bentley's Miscellany.

STRYCHNINE.

STRYCHNINE is a chemical preparation of the nux vomica, which is the fruit of the genus strychnos. It grows in Ceylon and the several districts of India, and is a tree of moderate size. Its stem is short and crooked, and its leaves are thick and shining. The fruit is of a rich orange color, with a hard and smooth rind, and the pulp is white and soft; within the rind are round flat seeds scarcely an inch in diameter, and of an ashen gray color, and covered with small or minute silky hairs. The Germans call these seeds "gray eyes," the Arabs "dog-killer" and "fish-scale," and it is vulgarly called in America, "dog-button," from being often used as a poison for canine quadrupeds.

The seed of this fruit or the nux vomica, sometimes called vomix nut, is a deadly poison, and its nature and properties were understood by the Orientals, and used as a medicine long before it was known to other nations. Strychnine is the chemical preparation of the nut, and is vegetable alkaloid; it has an intensely bitter taste, similar to that of some metallic salts. It is an energetic poison, acting on the nervous system, producing tetanus. In the arts it has no use. In order to procure strychnine the seeds are boiled in dilute sulphuric acid until they are soft, and crushed, and the expressed liquid mixed with an excess of hydrate of lime, which throws down the alkaloids. The precipitate is then boiled in spirits of wine or alcohol, and filtered while hot. This liquid when properly purified, crystalizes in small brilliant, octahedral crystals, which are transparent and colorless.

It is said that the natives of Hindoostan often use nox vomica in the same way as the opium eater, and commence by taking about one eighth of a nut a day, and gradually increase to an entire nut. If it is eaten directly before or after food no unpleasant effects are produced, but if neglected spasms are the result.

TAKING THINGS EASY.—When a man tells you that he "always takes things easy," and "never puts himself out of the way for anything or anybody," set him down in your mental memorandum book as a case of chronic laziness and selfishness. Such easy going individuals never win either fortune or fame. They may call their indifference independence; but if so, they make a miserable mistake. Real independence is the offspring of well directed energy; and the "philosophy of indolence" is nothing better than a mean and contemptible sophistry. "Whatever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might," is the vigorous language of Inspiration; and David Crockett's "Be sure you are right, then go ahead," is simply the divine command translated into rough Anglo-Saxon.

EDWIN BOOTH'S new theatre, New York, will cost about $200,000. Its site is the corner of Sixth avenue and Twenty-third street.

MANY a man's tongue is a two-edged sword, one of the edges cutting his friends, and the other himself.

COVETOUSNESS terms liberality a spendthrift, and prodigality calls her a churl; she is alike contrary to both.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO,.....SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1867.

THE MORAL OF IT.

WHETHER or not we accept as reliable in detail, the dispatches of yesterday in regard to the elections in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana, it is evident that the great reactionary movement long forseen by many, and which we predicted several months before the late election in this State, is still in progress with undiminished momentum, without having yet attained its culminating point. Whether or not, it is true that in Ohio the negro-suffrage amendment has been defeated by a majority of forty thousand votes, there can be no doubt whatever that there is a vast multitude of electors throughout the North, who hated slavery without entertaining any particular affection for the negro, and in whose minds the antipathies of race and caste, are as yet stronger than any political affinities. In our judgment the reaction of which the indications are so unmistakable and which seems likely to restore the Democratic party to power, is chiefly due to two causes, first, the general discontent under the burdens of taxation, and the growing alarm at the financial condition of the country; and second, a wide spread feeling in the popular mind, that the humanitarianism of the Republicans has been carried too far, and has had too exclusively in its contemplation, the benefit of the negro. The appeals of the Democratic press to these two feelings have been strong, persistent, artful; and it is not to be wondered at that they have proved successful. Whether we regard the antipathy to the negro and Chinese races, which exerted so powerful an influence upon our own State election as a conservative instinct implanted by nature in the Caucasian breast for wise purposes, or as a narrow and hateful prejudice which is ever strongest in the ignorant and ignoble, there can be no question at all as to its strength and tenacity. Experience has shown that it is one of those sentiments that are far more easily stimulated than rebuked. To appeal to it successfully, requires but a moderate share of the talent of the demagogue; while the most persuasive pleading of the humanitarian, and the loftiest eloquence of the orator seem to have proved powerless to dislodge it from the minds of the masses.

The other point, namely, taxation, and the burdens growing out of the war, has furnished the Democratic party with another pregnant text upon which they have not failed to improve in a very effective manner. The class of men who are capable of feeling keenly the inconveniences of heavy taxation is vastly larger than the class of men who are accessible to motives of lofty and unselfish patriotism; and even among those who in great crises, or in moments of exaltation and enthusiasm, are susceptible to the influence of such motives, the great majority cannot long sustain their feelings at the elevated pitch of disinterestednees and self-denial. During the terrible excitement of the war, feeling was stimulated, and there was nothing to cool the ardor of patriotic impulse. There was something in the very atmosphere that tended to make men careless of small privations, and to a certain extent, reckless of interest. While every day brought news of battles fought and victories won, while gallant men were laying down their lives by thousands for the cause of the Union, those who espoused that cause, yet did not fight for it, would have beenashamed to complain of mere sacrifices of property even had they felt as many of them have comfort since learned to feel. But unfortunately, the burdens, or instead of ceasing with the contest, not only continued, but increased after the rebellion had collapsed. The excitement ceased at the very time when the load began to be felt, and when the need of some stimulus to patriotic endurance was greatest. At the close of the war, a formidable task devolved upon the Republican party, a task to which no party has ever yet proved equal, that, namely, of introducing innovations and changes to adapt a country that has passed through a revolutionary crisis, to a new condition of things, without provoking reaction and losing popularity. The Republicans had to meet in some way, all the difficulties of Reconstruction; and it was utterly impossible for them, unless gifted with more than merely mortal wisdom, to meet those difficulties in such a way as to escape criticism. The party in power, in periods of doubt and difficulty always labors under the terrible disadvantage that it has to take the initiative, to do something, to strike out some line of policy; while its adversary, the party out of power, has nothing to do but to criticise, to object, and to point out difficulties and inconveniences, a task which is always comparatively simple. In the case in question, the work devolving upon an "opposition" was especially easy. The problem that presented itself at the close of the war to the leaders of the party then in power, was appalling in its complexity. Principles had to be settled before the facts upon which their determination depended had been ascertained. Upon many of the most important questions involved in the problem of Reconstruction, there was a bewildering confusion of theories and opinions. The popular mind was unsettled. There were no precedents to furnish light or guidance; the circumstances were new, and the principles applicable to them had to be reasoned out a priori. To devise a plan or policy that would not involve grave difficulties, and be open to many plausible objections was simply an impossibility; and of course the Republicans failed to devise any such plan or policy. Accordingly, nothing could be simpler than the course marked out for the "opposition" to pursue from the date of the earliest movement of Congress in the work of re-establishing the Union, or, as the pious Nashy expressively phrases it, of "making things normal again." To object that things were done without precedent, for which no precedent existed, because the circumstances themselves were unprecedented; to denounce measures as unconstitutional which were dictated by the law of self-preservation, and when the necessity for those measures grew out of novel circumstances, unforeseen, and unprovided for by the founders of the Constitution; to propose nothing themselves, and to subject everything that was proposed by their opponents to carping and disingenuous criticism; to pretend to approve the objects of the war and to admit its necessity while they harped incessantly upon evils that were its inevitable consequences; to profess devotion to the Union, while opposing with bitter obstinacy the measures necessary to preserve it, and heaping derision and slander upon the ablest and most conspicuous defenders; to sneer at the plea for justice to the negro, as the cant of a spurious philanthropy, and to lose no opportunity of appealing to all the most sordid and selfish instincts of human nature—these were the obvious and easy tactics naturally suggested to an "opposition" by the political situation; and being promptly adopted, and persistently acted upon, they have been as fruitful in results as the most sanguine reactionist could have anticipated But the important question is, not as to the present extent, but as to the real significance of this reaction in the popular mind. Does it indicate that the people regret the sacrifices they have made for the suppression of the rebellion, and appalled by the difficulties of Reconstruction, and the present aspect of the negro question, that they are inclined to look upon the war itself as a mistake, or merely that no party can long remain in control of public affairs and exposed to the searching criticism of vigilant and bitter opponents without suffering a loss of their popularity and being precipitated from power? This is a question which with others of a less speculative character, will be determined at the next Presidential election.

The failure of the attempt to establish the College of California upon a permanent basis, after a struggle of many years on the part of a few enlightened friends of liberal culture, furnishes another striking proof of the Philistinism of the present generation of Californians. The efforts of the men who have been laboring in the cause have met with little encouragement in the community at large, showing that the people had no very lively appreciation of the benefits to be derived from an educational institution of any higher grade than the schools and academies, ambitiously called "colleges," which already abound throughout the State. For learning itself, aside from direct utilitarian applications and results, there seems indeed to be very little respect among us. The consequence is, that the project of establishing a Californian University has been abandoned, and the Trustees have tendered to the State authorities, for the use of the Agricultural College, the lands held by them for the former institution. The Agricultural College will doubtless meet with cordial support, being a practical, potato-growing institution, uninfected by the effeminacy of "book learning," and having associations with sub-soil ploughs, guano, and poudrette, instead of with Greek roots and the Differential Calculus.

We have received a copy of a neat pamphlet of twenty-three pages containing the oration and poem delivered before the Society of California Pioneers on the occasion of celebrating their seventeenth aniversary. The oration, which is a production of more than ordinary ability, was delivered by William H. Clark Esq. ex-President of the association, and the poem, entitled "A Legend of San Francisco," was written by Charles Warren Stoddard, and read by John Swett, the Superintendent of Public Instruction. Among the Pioneers pesent on the occasion were ex-Presidents Haris, Roach, and Sutton; ex-Vice Presidents Cunningham and Chappille, together with eighteen members entitled to wear the red badge by virtue of their having become residents of California prior to 1849, and one hundred and seventy-four whose residence dates back to that year.

Charles Henry Webb is writing "Things" for the New York Citizen. He has dropped his old nom de plume, "Inigo," and writes under his own name.

ORIGIN OF THE LAST BONNET.

Says Dolly, "I want a new bonnet.
Now, spider, pray will you not try
To make one?" "Oh, yes," says the spider,
"If I can but catch me a fly."

Then Dolly fell into a slumber,
To make bonnet strings for the fair;
A gossamer line telegraphic
The spider spun over her hair.

A fly paying homage to beauty,
In circles about her young head,
Alighting, his feet were entangled
At once in the gossamer thread.

Aroused by the sensitive fibre,
The spider sprang after his prey,
Whose fright giving strength to his pinions,
They freed him and bore him away.

But like a well-bred cavallero,
Before he expanded his wings,
He left as his card for the spider,
A speck on the gossamer strings.

And thus was the latest of fashions
Invented—the bonnet was won,
And Dolly awoke from her slumbers,
To find herself leading the ton.

CLASSICAL DIVERSIONS.

THE composition of Greek and Latin verses, is an exercise which still retains in the English Universities as much prominence as it enjoyed in the time of Gray, who was almost as proud of some of his Latin poems, as he was of his famous elegy. In our American colleges the study of the classics is seldom carried beyond the point of prose composition in its simplest form, and there are very few even among our most accomplished scholars who could without great labor, acheive so comparatively easy a task as the production of half a dozen "nonsense hexameters." Accordingly, we are not surprised to find that the Latin versions of certain favorite American poems, that have from time to time appeared in the New York Citizen, are the work of an Irish or Canadian scholar, namely, of William Henry Halpine of Huron University, Canada West, and a brother of the editor of the Citizen. Professor Halpine's latest feat of this kind, consists of translation into Latin verse of a poem delivered by "Miles" on Washington's birthday, 1865, as "An Appeal to the Patriotic and Benevolent for a Soldiers' Home." There may be some few among the readers of the Californian who have preserved sufficient of their early classical education to make a specimen of this skillful and graceful performance interesting to them.

We give a single stanza, the original English first, followed by the Latin rendering:

Forever past the days of gloom,
The long sad days of doubt and fear,
When women, by her idle loom,
Heard the dread battle's nearing boom
With clasped hands and straining ear;
While each new hour the past pursues
With further threat of loss and pain,
Till the sick senses would refuse
To longer drink the bloody news
That told of sons and brothers slain.

Nunc sunt amaræ præteritæ dies!
Dies acerbæ tristitia et metu!
Quum virgines matresque flentes,
Textilibus studiis relictis,
Hausere bellorum auribus horridum
Clamorem acutis, et duplici mann;
Hora dolores quaque plures
Majus et exitium minante;
Donec recusat victa doloribus
Mens res amaras accipere auribus;
Natis cruento Marte cæsis,
Fratribus excitio peremptis!

The Citizen states that among the unprofessional scholars of New York, who possess sufficient classical accomplishments to be able to indulge in metrical diversions of this sort, are General John A. Dix, and Alexander T. Stewart, the great dry goods merchant, who is said to be as proud of "his still perfect Latin and Greek," as of "the vast fortune which he has evoked under the enchanting rod of his well directed industry."

The City Gardens.—The moonlight concert at the City Gardens last night was well attended. It is to be regretted that the rainy season which is fast approaching will soon put a stop to these delightful entertainments. A few more can be given and we trust will be. San Francisco has long needed a pleasant resort, where friends can meet one another, promenade, talk and enjoy themselves. This afternoon a prime concert will be given, and to-morrow a choice selection of sacred music will be played. Boating on the lake, bowling alleys, croquet ground, etc., afford a plentiful supply of amusement.

Woodward's Gardens.—The South American lion recently added to the zoological department of these delightful gardens, attracts much attention. Beautiful birds, flowers, fruits, paintings, and thousands of works of Nature and Art, render Woodward's Gardens a most charming spot in which to spend a few hours. To-day a prime concert will be given and a sacred concert will take place to-morrow.

[SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE TO THE "CALIFORNIAN."]

BOHEMIAN PALACE, SEPT., 1867.

After a miscrable, dry, dusty, rickety, ride from Stockton via Murphy's and the Big Trees of Calaveras county, we make a detour over one of the most abominable pieces of stage road on the surface of this opaque planet, extending from the barbarian and pockmarked town of Murphy's to the pleasant and poetic looking little city of Sonora, that lies nestled at the feet of the sunny hills. From here we start for the famous resort known as the Crimean House, a sad, dejected, dilapidated looking tavern, standing alone in an open dry piece of mountain prarie. The C. H. is fifteen miles from Sonora. Leaving this ancestral institution, with its dingy walls and its happy nomadic proprietor haunting your memory, we move for Coulterville, twenty-four miles distant. This part of the journey is quite pleasant, as there are a number of empty barns along the route, no inhabitants, and no dogs. In the pious langnage of Goldsmith :

Ill fares the land to hastening ills a prey,
Where poodle dogs and pious men doth fade away.

AT COULTERVILLE

The shades of evening had fallen—beautiful shades with silver stars glistening in the mystic heavens when I rode into Coulterville. Here the traveler, by instinct, inquires for that genial and big hearted man, J. C. Coulter, after whom the snburban city has been named, as being the most proper person to initiate him in the manner of traversing that mysterious and "narrow way," that leads to the famous Yosemite Valley. In the morning, mounted on a "prancing steed," from the splendid stocked livery stahle of Mr. C., we start for the valley. It is sixteen miles to Black's, a small "country tavern," at the terminus of the wagon road from Coulterville, and at a piont where commences the trail to Yosemite. From Black's, where the traveler usually stops over night when he proceeds hy this route, you depart next morning on the trail a distance of some 50 or 60 miles. Some tourists take guides, others "go it alone," as Charles Reade has it in that book of moral spices, Griffith Gaunt. A day's ride through dense forests and pleasant openings, over intricate paths, and night comes to find the weary traveler safely and cozily located at the cheerful hearthstone of the Yosemite Valley Hotel, presided over hy J. M. Hutchings, Esq.

IN THE VALLEY.

A three days' reconnoisance of the valley made us wish our limited time extended to three weeks duration! This is certainly one of the most noble and impressive valleys on the face of God's green earth. How magnificently sublime are the towering walls of granite that raise themselves up towards Heaven, as if they sought to worship at the shrine of their Omnipotent Architect, who here erected Nature's Eternal Temples in the Eternal Valley, imhued with His grandeur and His greatness. The various diamond cataracts that sing their mountain music, and float like magic spray upon the polished granite, how tenderly heautiful they look! O, if I were only a poet, how would I describe this enchanting Valley of the Gods. Fit abode for Bohemian and Peri. But I must at present curtail myself in the line descriptive, and will be content (as I presume you will be) with giving you a table of the altitudes at Yosemite Valley.

WATERFALLS:

Indian Name.	Signification.	American Name.	Height above Valley.
Po-ho-no	Spirit of the Evil Wind	Bridal Veil	940 ft

The Yosemite Valley is 4,060 feet above the sea. Its general course is northeasterly and southwesterly. The main Merced river runs through it. In many places the walls of the valley are nearly vertical. The monntains surronnding it will average ahont 4,000 feet in height.

So much for the valley. Now for the return. Departing we come by the way of Mariposa, visit the Big Trees, near Clark's, and which are a much more interesting sight than those in Calaveras county. It is a big day's ride from the valley to Mariposa, over the mountains, although the distance is only forty-seven miles. some say fifty, so people tell me, but I found no difficulty in riding the distance and visiting the Big Trees besides, five miles off the road, and reached the city (Mariposa) in time for an eight o'clock supper.

MARIPOSA.

This once lively and pleasant little town has suffered seriously hy fires, having heen twice destroyed. Its people have seen enongh of fire on this earth, and I trust they will be more fortunate in their locations hereafter, hoth as to this world and the next. The town is still plucky, and determined not to give up the ghost yet. It is heing rebuilt, and many of the new buildings will be handsome brick structures. The city and county supports two very excellent weekly newspapers. The Gazette, edited by A. M. Swaney, and the Mail, presided over by my friend Reynolds, a valliaut victor in the late political war. Tourists arriving here by calling on Messrs Washburne & Cook, will be able to procure all desired information with regard to the country, the Big Trees and the valley.

OFF FOR STOCKTON.

We are off for Stockton, a stage trip of one hundred miles. We leave Mariposa at one o'clock P. M. and reach Stockton the following day at the same hour. This route to reach Yosemite Valley is much more pleasant and agreeable than that hy way of Murphy's. When parties of five or more desire it, by addressing the Messrs. Fishers, of Stockton, owners of the line, they will be driven through by daylight to Mariposa, and the day following, Messrs. Washburne & Cook will express the same party through by daylight, reaching the Yosemite Hotel before snndown. So that it only takes two days by this arrangement to reach the Yosemite from San Francisco.

STOCKTON AND THE STOCKTONIANS.

I spent a very pleasant day among the Stocktonians. Had a hrief glance at their pleasant, prosperous city of 5,500 inhabitants. Wheat and churches are the two great staples of Stockton. I visited the Lunatic Asylums. In the male asylnm there are 540 patients, in the female, 213. The matron of the latter information informs me that the patients are usually very orderly and quiet, and that among themselves they never quarrel, hut on the contrary, are generally very affable to each other. The seamstress, Mrs. Pike, a most estimable and kind hearted young woman, has a number of her more unfortunate sisters under her charge, whom she educates to sew, embroider, knit, and work sswing machines. The patients seem to be quite happy when they can thns be employed, and much prefer it to idleness. The sleeping apartment in both asylums appear to be over scrupulously clean, but the male inmates seem to be very slovenly and unclean in their persons and manners. On the contrary, woman's instinctive ove of order and beauty, seems not to fail her even in her present condition as seen here at the asylum, so that in neatness and taste they look as tidy as if they were each of them a mistress in her home.

DOWN THE RIVER.

The steamer Cornelia and her consort, the Julia, are popnlar boats on the Stockton route, and hetween them the river trade finds no rivals; and could have no superiors, run as they are now, on the hest time. Safe and commodious, they satisfy a great public want.

IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Once again we find ourselves in this glorious city. It looks like home. When a man becomes thoroughly educated in the "world," he can live nowhere else than in a great city. All cities are minature worlds. They are the great theatres of dramatic life. Of all lives give us the life blood and the currents of metropolitan existence—though fate does decree that we proceed to Russian America to-morrow.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

DAN Bryant draws large audiences, shouts of laughter, yells of applanse, and lots of money, every night. On Monday, and Tuesday evening, the entertainment consisted of Shandy Maguire, a terrific Irish drama, and the capital farce of The Irish Lion. On Wednesday, Shamys O'Brien, which has become very popular with the theatre-goers, was played, and on Thursday, The Bells of Shandon was presented. Last night, Irish Emigrant and Handy Andy were performed.

This afternoon, Shandy Maguire will be played, and the performance this evening will consist of Shamus O'Brien and The Irish Lion. On Monday, an Irish drama entitled Ishnavouge, will he produced and played throughout the week.

A large audience assembled in the Metropolitan Theatre on Monday evening, on the occasion of Miss Emma Howson's benefit. The opera of Maritana was capitally performed. The fair heneficiary gained great applause for her rendition of the title role, and was encored in "Scenes that are Brightest" and the duet of "Sainted Mother," with Miss Clelia Howson. Henri Herherte sang and acted "Don Cæsar de Bazan" with great spirit and delighted the audience hy the manner in which he sang, "Let me Like a Soldier Fall,' though he certainly strained a little too much for effect in the highest notes. Miss Clelia Howson made a capital "Lazarillo," singing the music charmingly, and acting the part with an earnestness, which gained for the faithful page, the sympathy of every one in the house. On Tuesday, Mr. Fitzgerald took a benefit, and made his first appearance in tragedy, performing "Othello," in the play of that name. The house was not a good one, neither was the performance. Mr. Fitzgerald made some good points in the more impassioned scenes, but there was a terrible stiltedness and sameness of style in his reading. I must say that Mr. Fitzgerald is entirely wrong in the stage bnsiness which he introduces in the third scene of Act III, where the following takes place between "Othello" and "Desdemona :"

Des.—Why is your speech so faint? are yon not well?
Oth.—I have a pain upon my forehead here,
Des.—'Faith, that's with watching; 'twill away again;
Let me but bind it hard, within this hour
It will be well.
Oth.—Your napkin is too little.
[He puts the handkerchief from him and it drops.]
Let it alone. Come I'll go in with you.

When Mr. Fitzgerald, in the character of "Othello," put the handkerchief from him and it dropped, "Desdemona" stepped forward and attempted to pick it up. "Othello," making a prohibitory gesture with his hand, said :

"Let it alone. Come, I ll go in with you."

The exclamation, evidently, does not refer to the handkerchief, but to "Othello's" head. "Desdemona," in her anxiety to afford "Othello" relief, does not notice that she has dropped it, neither does "Othello." Had "Desdemona" attempted to pick up the handkerchief, and been deterred from doing so by "Othello," her defense, when, taxed with having given it to "Cassio," would have been very easy—"you know that when you had a pain in your head the other day, I tried to hind your forehead with the handkerchief, you pushed it from you and peevishly forbade me pick it up." Desdemonia might easily under common circnmstances forget so trrivial an affair as the loss of a handkerchief, but would certainly, when accused of having given it to a lover, remember, having been told by her husband to let it alone, when she dropped it. The loss of the handkerchief should be made to appear as accidental, and care should be taken to show that the attention of "Othello" and "Desdemona" is diverted from it. "Emela" says :—

"She let it drop by negligence."

The "Iago" of Mr. Bates was a very unfinished performance. He bellowed the soliloquies, instead of uttering them in a calm, reflective manner, and failed to express the delight which "Iago" took the villainous labor he was engaged in. Mrs. Fitzgerald, who on this occasion made her first appearance on the San Francisco stage, did not display much force, but generally read correctly and with good taste. Frank Howson made a slightly heavy old "Cassio;" J. H. Vinson was excellent in the character of "Brabantio," and Mrs. P. R. Saunders played "Emelia" very well.

On Wednesday, Andrew Torning, the talented scenic artist, whose productions have assisted in the success of hundreds of plays produced on the San Francisco stage, was the recipient of a complimentary benefit, tendered him by the Howard Social Club. It wasn't half a benefit. The Howard people did their best I dare say, hut the people might have a good deal better for Mr. Torning before he left for Australia. Some of the finest scenery in this State—not intending any disrespect to the Yosemite Falls and the Big Trees—has been made by Andrew Torning, and as San Francisco is deficient in real gurgling violets, umbrageous forests and mossy banks, we cannot very comfortably spare this clever imitator of Nature's works. Mr. Torning will leave for Sidney on the 16th inst., in the barque Sunshine. The Flying Dutchman and Pierette, or the Village Rivals, were played on the occasion of Mr. Torning's benefit. On Thursday evening, to gratify a very general wish, the opera of Maritana was repeated and performed in a style which pleased even the most critical. Last night The Flying Dutchman, which presents some very fine scenic effects and affords Andrew Torning a good opportunity to evince his talent as a pantomimic artist, was repeated. This afternoon The Flying Dutchman will be played for the last time.

This evening, W. B Hamilton, the veteran actor and manager, will take a benefit. On this occasion Miss Caroline Hamilton, the daughter of the beneficiary, will make her first appearance on any stage, in the character of "Julia," in The Hunchback. Miss Hamilton has been for some time under the tuition of her aunt, Miss Caroline Chapman, one of the most thoroughly accomplished and artistic actresses who have ever graced the San Francisco stage.

On Monday, the grand spectacular drama entitled Azael, The Prodigal Son, will he produced with gorgeous scenery and dresses, grand processions, dancing girls, etc. During the last month the preparations for the production of this drama have been in daily progress, in spite of the occupation of the Metropolitan Theatre by the Japanese. On this occasion Mrs. F. M. Bates, who made snch a favorable impression on the public on her first appearance, will commence an engagement at the Metropolitan Theatre. Mrs. Bates is a charming actress and will prove a valnahle addition to the company.

On Tuesday, after the regular business of that admirable association, the British Benevolent Society, was dispatched, a delightful musical reunion took place. The ladies and gentlemen of the Motet and Madrigal Society, which comprises many members of "The Twelve," volunteered their services, and many fine old English hallads, glees and madrigals were sung. Henri Herberte was never in hetter voice, he sang, "The Queen's Letter," and "The Village Blacksmith" splendidly. Swift and Wunderlich gained great applause and a unanimous encore for their duet of "Robin Ruff." Mrs. Uhrig Leach, Mrs. Grotjean and other ladies sang very finely "The Chough and Crow," "Home, Sweet Home," and of course, "God Save the Queen;" were among the musical compositions rendered. The members of the British Benevolent Society were delighted, and unanimously resolved to tender the Motet and Madrigal Society the use of the rooms for their next concert, and in addition, about one hundred tickets were spoken for. The British Benevolent Society has since its institution accomplished an immense amount of good in a very quiet manner. If the members agree to enliven their monthly meetings by a little music and social amusement their labors will be executed pleasantly, and perhaps many may be induced to take an active part who have hitherto shrnnk from doing their duty. TOUCHSTONE.

REGRET.

BY A. C. SWINBURNE.

Now the days are all gone over
Of our singing, love by lover,
Days of summer-colored seas,
Days of many melodies.

Now the nights are all past over
Of our dreaming, where dreams hover
In a mist of fair false things,
Nights with quiet folded wings.

Now the kiss of child and mother,
Now the speech of sister and brother,
Are but with us as strange words,
Or old songs of last year's birds.

Now all good that comes or goes is
As the smell of last year's roses,
As the shining in our eyes
Of dead Summer in past skies.

THE MAREMNA.

The Maremna is in Summer, the word that drives the sleep from many an Italian woman's pillow as she thinks of the perils that her husband, her brother, or her betrothed is encountering as he reaps the fertile harvest, and gains, at the risk of his life, the wages that will enable him and his to live through the Winter. "A me mi pare una Maremna amara" is the burden of the song with which many a child is rocked to sleep. And with reasons. The Maremna is the Littorale or shore of the Tuscan sea; and there the coasts that bound the blue waters of the Mediterranean are lined by tangled jungles and pestilential marshes, where at each sunset arises the baleful fever which, passing in scorn over the ruined cities that its pernicious breath has depopulated, creeps along like the sleuth-hound until it finds the hardy mountaineer returning from his day of labor, and smites him with the wasting blight that saps his strength. Yet year after year do the sons of Italy descend with unwearied energy to these valleys and deadly plains, to reap the crops that have grown uncared-for but luxuriantly, death and disease stalking behind them, and the fear of falling victims to the power of the evil air urging them to increased exertions in order that they may earlier return and share their scanty gains with their wives and children. They march gaily, too, often singing alternately in their rough monotone the songs they have composed themselves, cheerful in the consciousness that they are fulfilling a duty, and this although knowing that they have to fight a foe against whom neither courage, nor energy, nor strength can avail, but whose damp breath appears to draw the marrow from their bones and fill them with fever; sometimes sending them weak and emaciated, useless as workmen, to their native homes; sometimes in a few hours laying their bodies low, to lie, far from family and friends, in unconsecrated ground.

ONE OF THE "RULERS" THAT PRUSSIA WIPED OUT.—The Duke of Nassau could never console himself for the narrowness of his dominions, which was the perpetual sorce of fun to the Prussian papers. They one day declared that he, having exiled a courtier, stood on his palace'st errace to see the order executed; the next day the Prussian newspapers would publish a pseudo-decree, forbidding all faithful subjects from discharging muskets or pistols in a horizontal line, in order to avoid violating the frontiers of neighboring States; to their jokes upon his demifluvial navy (he owned only half a river) there were no end. The louder Prussia laughed the more melancholy the duke became. His courtiers tried their best to raise his spirits: the census returns were exaggerated, the births were increased, deaths were diminished, maps made which represented hamlets which ceased to exist in the days of Germanicus as flourishing cities—all in vain. One day a railway company asked permission to build their road across his duchy; he granted permission on condition that the road should pursue a zigzag line, so as to double or tripple the distance run, and force locomotives to travel slowly, so that passengers might think the Duchy of Nassau one of the largest in Germany. He recovered his good humor from that day.

RHEUMATISM.—The latest numbers of the Medical and Surgical Reporter contain an article on the "Causes and Treatment of Rheumatism," in which it is held that this disease is chiefly caused by either an acid or an alkali disturbance of the fluids of the body, which, after having been ascertained by the proper tests, at once indicate the sure treatment. When the distnrbance is caused by an excess of acids, alkalies, like potash and soda, produce a cure, and when the alkalies are in excess, acids, like lemon-juice, etc., are successfully administered. This would seem to explain why sometimes one class of remedies and sometimes an entirely opposite kind is required to cure the malady, even in the same persons.

VIRTUE is the humble violet nestled away under its broad, green leaves, over whose head the storms of adversity may pass in safety; vice, the gaudy, poisonous flower, one moment flaunting in fancied security, the next crushed to the earth by some gust of passion, to be trampled upon and neglected, even by those who admire its dangerous beauty. Virtue is the brightest, vice the blackest, thread in the web of life.

DAMASCUS TO-DAY

WE all know something of Damascus—that it is one of the earliest cities in the world which attained prominence; that it is mentioned in the first book of the Bible; was captured by David; that its inhabitants are about half Christians and half Jews, and their mode of life different to that of Western countries. We have heard, also, of Damascus' principal street, called "Straight" (which is straight, but very narrow,) and that the private houses are magnificent, internally, and mean externally; yet we like, at intervals, to refresh our memories of the picturesque city, and read about the grand Orientals of the present. Presuming that our readers will share the pleasure with us, we make room for a few passages, from the Tribune, whose correspondent is on the spot:

THE CITY.

Damascus is the "heart of the Orient." If that be so, then some of the veins flowing to the Orient's heart have deeper tinges of Eastern hues than the heart itself. Had one never seen Cairo, Damascus would seem intensely Eastern; after Cairo, it is hard, and cold, and regular. The buildings of Cairo are ancient, dilapidated, and decayed; those of Damascus are in good repair, better built, and better kept; but one may see in a ride from the Mouski to the Citadel more varieties of ancient and modern Oriental architecture than in all the streets called Straight; in Cario, lattices, balconies, and jalousies, stucco and tile-work, and arabesques; houses that approach nearer and nearer each other toward the top, till kisses or whispers might be exchanged across the street; quaintest of gateways and windows, towers and minarets, and domes. In Cairo one is bewildered by the number of changes that pass under his eye in a walk of half an hour. Damascus has all these, doubtless, but nowhere blended in such multiplicity of detail. Her edifices, are as I have mentioned before, nearly all of one color, and all of one general style, flat-roofed and heavy, and, to external appearance, merely mud huts on an enlarged and improved plan.

LUXURIOUS RESIDENCES.

This absence of street architecture or decoration, gives to the eye of an American—accustomed to seeing houses built with special view to the showing off well from the street—an air of poverty and meanness which stamps itself upon our impressions of the place. Such an impression, however, is quickly dispelled, so far as Damascus is concerned, when we get once within the inclosing walls are generally mosaisics, or paintings in imitation of tile-work. Every court has its pavements and its fountains—almost every one its flowers and its trees. Many of the rooms are elegant, the furniture wanting in many things that constitute our home comfort; but, in the richness of their tapestries, the luxuriant sweep of their drapery, the softness of their couches, and the brightness of their mirrors, these Orientals are not to be surpassed.

SCENE FROM THE TEMPLE.

In the great mosque of the Omeiyades, or as it is now called of "St. John," a scowling inspection of our slippers was made, lest, by some neglect, our unholy tread should pollute the sacred temple. A man stood holding aside the screen, that a look might be taken at the so-called "tomb of St. John," allowing the turbaned gazers to linger, but hurrying us impatiently away. Like almost all the ancient structures of the East, it has long passed its age of beauty. The Oriental coloring is faded: the pavements are sunken, the mosaics crumbling and dropping from the walls. Its lofty height, the majesty of its mighty columns, its immense dome, must continue to impress the beholder for centuries to come. For any examination in detail we were not permitted to linger, but were hastened away, because, said the guide, of an approaching funeral procession." We stayed long enough, however, to get a look at the Greek inscription that ignorance has permitted to remain all these years over one of the beautiful portals: "Thy Kingdom, O Christ, is an everlasting Kingdom, and thy throne is established forevermore." We found Hassan waiting in the porch, with his arms full of boots and shoes, and we followed him up a winding stair to the top of the tall minaret, to get a view of the city. We took our stand in the little gallery running outside the tower, where the muezzin stands at early morn, with his message for the people, "Prayer is better than sleep! Awake and pray;" and again, at noon and night, the same voice falls upon them with "God is great"—"God is but one!"—"Come to prayer!"—"There is no God but God!" From this light the picture was lovely, indeed, for the long line of mud-colored, windowless walls, seen from the street, no longer shut out the real beauty of the city, but seemed strong and suitable inclosures for the beautiful courts and gardens. The varied color of the roofs, the domes and minarets glistening in the sun, the clustering tops of the khans, the gardens smiling in all the beauty of June, the tossing palms, the sparkling waters of the Abana, the distant stretch of desert sand, and afar the snowy summits of Lebanon—it was, indeed, very beautiful.

AN Englishman has devised a plan for supplying the residents of crowded cities with fresh country air, imported at so much per cubic foot, and laid in pipes, like Spring Valley water.

THE CUSTOM OF DRINKING HEALTHS.

"HEALTHS" in honor of mortals came to us from abroad. The first given in Britain was given by a lady. It was the "Health of the King;" and mischief came of it. The lady was Rowena, daughter of Hengist. That Saxon ally of the British King Vortigern entertained at a banquet the monarch who he intended first to make his son-in-law and then to destroy. After dinner-the ladies were admitted—a custom which has not yet died on occasions of public festivity—and Rowena was at the head of them. She carried aloft a capacious goblet of wine, and approaching the dazzled and delighted King, she said, with a courteous reverence: "Lord King, I drink your health." This was said in Saxon, and Vortigern shook his head to imply that he had not been taught Saxon, and was very sorry for it. He looked inquiringly at his interpreter, and that official translated the lady's words. But this rendered Vortigern little the wiser, as Rowena stood silently gazing at him, cup in hand, and he found himself in utterly new circumstances, and in dreadful want of a master of the ceremonies. "What ought I to do?" he asked of the interpreter; and the latter replied, "As the lady has offered to drink your health, saying: 'Wacht heil!' you should bid her quaff the wine, saying, 'Drinc heil!'" And Vortigern shaped his British mouth to the utterance of the foreign odium, and Rowena smiled so exquisitely at his uncouth accent, before she kissed the brim of the cup, that the King lost head and heart, and speedily became double drunk with love and wine. Thus was a drinking of healths brought into Britain, and under such distinguished patronage that it became a universal fashion. And it had a pretty circumstance attached to it, which, in later degenerate days, went out with the fashion itself. The gallant Vortigern, when he returned the Saxon lady's compliment, and took the cup to drink, not only quaffed it to her health, but before he did so, kissed her rose-tinted lips with such fervor that the custom of giving health was at once firmly established, and when a lady drank to a gentleman he not only pledged her with the formulary of "Drinc heil," but saluted her lips.

In course of time came the "reigning toasts," and noble ladies felt flattered at knowing they were the "toasts of the town." Clubs engraved their names on the club glasses, and the first poets of the day added a tribute of laudatory verse. Then came fashion of a grosser sort when each gallant, toasted the lady next to him, swore he would drink no wine but what was strained through her petticoat! We may fancy with what boisterous politeness the edge of the petticoat was seized, with what hilarious coyness it was defended, how some of the damsels looked over, under, or from the sides of their fans, while others affected to close the eyes which they kept open to look through the interstices of the convenient screen. Then the hems of the garments were placed over the glasses, the wine was poured through, and the Quixotic fellows quaffed the draft in honor of the fair ones! There came a time, however, when men had more refinement, and would not give up to the tipsy salutations of "health drinkers" the names of the true and modest mistresses of their hearts. The lover who was a gentleman, and yet who was a "good fellow" always kept his gentility before him, and his mistress' name to himself. An illustration of this is afforded us through Mr. John Bruce having luckily inserted in his admirable edition of Cowper, that writer's "Early Poems." In one of these, "The Symptons of Love," writen to "Delia," but really addressed to the author's early and only love, his cousin Theodora, are the following lines:

> And lastly, when summoned to drink to my flame
> Let her guess why I never once mentioned her name,
> Though herself and the woman I love are the same.

Connected with this subject of toasting the ladies, ill-fortune has sometimes come of it when it might be least expected. For example: "Honest men and bonnie lassies!" is a toast which one would think could never bring offence with it; but while the rule holds the exception presents itself. A young minister in Scotland was about to preach a probationary sermon in a church for the ministry of which he was a candidate. Being a stranger, he was housed and entertained by a parishioner, who invited many of his fellows to sup with the candidate on Saturday night. The elders had quietly saturated themselves with toddy and smoke when the unlucky probationer, in his innocence, proposed, before they parted, "Honest men and bonnie lassies!" The uncorighteous looked through their smoke and over their glasses with orthodox horror, and said that no minister would have their sympathy who could not stick quietly to his liquor, but whose thoughts were running on the lasses so near the Sabbath! The company assented, and the candidate had to forego the honor he coveted.

There was fine and generous delicacy and great readiness of wit in George II. when, during one of his absences abroad, on being asked if he would object to a toast which wished health to the Pretender, he replied that he would readily drink to the health of all unfortunate princes. This expressed readiness however, did not encourage the Jacobins in openly drinking to the only King they acknowledged. They continued, as they and their fathers before them had done, to have a bowl of water on the table, and holding their glasses over it, to drink to "the King," implying, of course, the King over the water.

ASSESSMENT OF MORTGAGES.
NOTICE TO TAX-PAYERS.

THE CITY AND COUNTY ASSESSOR IS NOW MAKing up the Assessment Roll of "MONEYS LOANED AND SOLVENT DEBTS SECURED BY MORTGAGE." The Roll is made up from the Records of Mortgages (unsatisfied) in the County Recorder's office. It is important that all persons interested should call, without delay, at the Assessessor's office, City Hall, and have corrected any errors there may be in amounts due or otherwise.

WM. R. WHEATON, Assessor.

"I Tbought thfy had Stopped Your Grog."—The following story is told by "Mark Twain" of a gallant naval officer: Twenty or thirty years ago, when missionary enterprise was in its infancy among the islands of the South Seas, Captain Summers anchored his sloop-of-war off one of the Marquesas, I think it was. The next morning he saw an American flag floating from the beach, Union down. This excited him fearfully, of course, and he sent off a boat at once to induire into the matter. Presently the boat returned, and brought a grave-looking missionary. The captain's anxiety ran high. He said:

"What's the trouble ont there?—quick!"

"Well, I am grieved to say, sir," said the missionary, "that the natives have been interrupting onr sacerdotal exercises."

"No!—blast their yeller hides, I'll—what—what was it yon said they'd been doing?"

"It pains me, sir, to say that they have been interrupting onr sacerdotal exercises."

"Interrupting your — your h—ll! Man them starboard guns! Staud by, now, to give 'em the whole battery!"

The astonnded clergyman hastened to protest agaiust such excessive rigorous measnres, and finally succeeded in making the old tar nnderstand that the natives had only been breaking up a prayer meeting.

"Oh, devil take it, man, is that all? I thonght you meant that they'd stopped your grog!"

Tea Wine and Spirit Merchants,

Importers and Wholesale Dealers in fine Brandies, Whiskies, Gins, Port, Sherry and Champagne Wines, Ale, Porter, Cider, Bitters, Cordials, Syrup, etc., for medicinal and family use, and suppliers to Families, Apothecaries, Physicians, City and Country Dealers, Hotels, Clubs, etc., in large or small quantities.

Observe Firm Name on each cork and fac simile signature on label.

[Trade Mark Registered.] WHITING & BERRY.

This is the only exclusive TEA, WINE AND SPIRIT STORE on the Pacific Coast.

It is neither a saloon or sample room, (as no wine or spirits are permitted to be drank on the premises,) but a depot where selected Teas and Pure Wines and Spirits may be procured at wholesale or retail for medicinal and family use. In this respect it is our aim to vie with Binninger & Co., New York, Bigelow & Dawes, London, and Cozzen & Co., of Washington, where every facility is offered to ladies as well as gentlemen in making their own selections and purchases in quantities to suit.

N. B.—Our Treatise on Wines, Spirits and Teas, may be had at our depot gratis, and will be mailed to consumers and dealers in the interior when requested.

WHITING & BERRY,

609 Sacramento Street, second door above Montgomery.

The Ladies are of one mind in pronouncing BOWMAN'S AMERICAN WASHING COMPOUND the best preparation for washing and cleaning in use. It is acknowledged to be a saving both in money and labor. The Compound softens the dirt, consequently the clothes require not more than one-half the rubbing necessary in washing by the old method; besides all who give it a trial acknowledge that their clothes are made whiter in washing with this Compound, than they were ever known to be by using any other preparation. For washing Woolen Goods and Flannels it cannot be equaled. Calicoes that can be washed with soap, without fading, are washed in the water used for boiling the white clothes. This Compound has been used in the eastern States for the past three years with perfect success. Warranted not to injure the clothes. For sale by all Grocers.

MURIEL.

Like some vision strange she stands,
Muriel, Muriel;
Jewels flashing on her hands,
Rarest gems from southern lands—
Scorns she e'en my light commands,
Muriel, Muriel.

Bend your pure eyes down to mine,
Muriel, Muriel;
Kiss me with those lips of thine,
Lips as sweet as Rhenish wine;
Lips and kisses all are mine,
Muriel, Muriel!

Half my love was never told,
Muriel, Muriel;
Though you look so grand and cold,
In your gems and laces old,
Mine you are to have and hold,
Muriel, Muriel.

O, but 'tis a picture sweet,
Muriel, Muriel;
Standing by the river fleet,
Wavelets singing at her feet;
Is it not some lovely cheat,
Muriel, Muriel?

Bend your pure eyes down to mine,
Muriel, Muriel;
Kiss me with those lips of thine—
Lips as sweet as Rhenish wine—
Lips and kisses all are mine,
Muriel, Muriel!

PRESERVING A WHALE—.A short time ago, a whale was stranded on the Norfolk (England) coast, and purchased as a speculation by a sharp practitioner, who advertised for information how to preserve it. A Sunderland wag replied to the advertisement, tendering the desired information on receipt of half a crown's worth of postage stamps, which arrived, and the following recipe was duly forwarded: "Put the whale carefully into a glass bottle, cover it with spirits of wine, (strong whisky may do;) then cork and seal up." The postage stamps were handed over to a charitable institution.

THE SNUG.—"The Snug" has heen located one door below Maguire's Opera House, for ten years past. It was established for the convenience of the habituates of the Opera House, and has the reputation of dispensing the best wines and liquors in the city, under the charge of its present proprietor, Mr. Timothy McCarty. Entrances from various parts of the Opera House to the har have heen cut, for the convenience of the public. Mr. McCarty gives his entire attention to his guests, and renders his establishment a "Snug" place hy day or night.

Belden's Family Depot for Domestic Luxuries.

At this depot are, all should know,
For him who strong or faint is,
Superior grub—for home or clnb—
And every kiud of dainties.
Westphalia hams, fresh oysters, clams,
Constituents of chowder,
Fine breakfast tea, and hominy,
And genuine curry powder.
Oil, mustard, wine, both French and Rhine,
Lard, coffee, ketchup, capers.
Crushed sugar, peas, aud Switzer cheese,
And sperm and waxen tapers.
The gihlets, pluck, of goose and duck,
Of woodcock, snipe and plovers,
Of partridge, too, and cockatoo—
The last express for lovers!
It seems absurh there scarce a bird—
My rhyme this somewhat ruffles—
But Belden's got in tin or pot,
The LIVER of with TRUFFLES.
Prunes, raisins, rice, preserves and spice,
Gin, whisky, rum and brandy,
Driuks made of malt, and tahle salt,
Tongues, sansages, and candy.
Above's not all to which I'd call
Particular attention.
Le vin d'elite, Chateau Lafitte,
And others, I would mention.
Surpassing fine Madeira wine,
St. Julien, port and sherry,
Chateaux Margaux and Veuve Clicquot,
Old apple jack and cherry.
La Rose, Chahlis, and Burgundy
Both white, and red and sightly,
Prime Hermitage of ripe old age,
Still, sparkling too and sprightly.
Santerne, medoc, still sparkling hock,
Johannesberg, Hockheimer,
Then sirs and dames (these German names
Would craze an English rhymer!)
Just come and huy, snd cease to sigh
For Egypt and its fleshpots;
Ne'er better fare did Pharoh share,
Or any other despots.

"You may talk to me of Baltimore and Philadelphia and New York, and their railroads and the trade of the Atlantic—let me tell you that the Pacific coast is already beginning to revolutionize the world."—Speech of the Hon. Wm. H. Seward to the people of Annapolis, Maryland, June, 1867.

ADDRESS

TO THE PERMANENT CITIZENS OF THE PACIFIC STATES AND TERRITORIES.

CITIZENS—We enjoy the finest country that the sun shines on, the most varied and fertile soil, the most extensive seaboard, and the greatest breadth of land having the richest metallic deposits posscased by any one nation of the earth, a land affording all the most varied material for manufactures, wools, hides, cotton, silk, coal, fihre gums, wood, and, above all, ahundance of every kind of food.

We are only a million of people, and yet have more land and sea than Russia with sixty millions—more land than France and Germany with their hundred millions of people. In the face of those vast resources, there are towns crumhling to decay, men seeking without finding employment. Something wrong here or this would not be happening. Let us consider.

The instructed mind of the population is nearly devoted to political office-seeking. Their ambition is misdirected. The rising youth are trained to idleness. This mode of thinking and training must be reversed if we would hold this magnificent country against the incoming harbarian.

We must teach our youth the glories of manufactures, of commerce, of industry. We muat nourish every effort, however rude, at msnufacturing what we require. By devoting some of our capital and our young people to manufactures and general industries we shall soon become busy, get rich, bring more and more people into the country, create new wants, huild up new factories and villages around them; cultivate more land, build more ships, generate more commerce, and thereby create profitahle employment for all who want work.

Now, fellow-citizens, some money capital is required to help on this industrial movement. Where shall we get it? There is a considerable fund which we may divert from its present bed and channel, viz: the Insurance Fund.

Consider. The peoplo of the Pacific States pay two hundred thousand dollars a month to the Insurance Compsnies for assuring them against losses from fire or shipwreck.

Thero are some fifteen of those Insurance offices in this city, each fishing for its share of this large fund. Each office pays a heavy rent, a half dozen officers and clerks, besides printing and advertising; the lowest cost is a thouaand dollars a month on each office, and with some it is douhle that. There are too many persons employed in the husiness; too much dozing over newspapers; too much red tape and circumlocution; too high salaries and too little work. Think of two hundred thousand dollars a month! two millions and a half a year!! paid to those sleepy gentlemen for what little they do. This must he reformed. Three or four Insurance offices are quite enough for the million of scattered inhabitants of tho Pacific States. A dozen of them may be aholished with great henefit to the community; some one or two have already withdrawn. This change would liherate some fifty men of education, whose husiness capacity would he of much greater service to the community in other hrsnches of industry, such as manufactures, agriculture, commerce, the fisheries, the forests and the mines. This change would also divert a million or two of dollars to other and more needful industries, whereby a thousand fold more of national capital and employment would he generated than hy the present drowsy system.

The managers of the Builders' Insurance proposc, with the co-operation of the people, that thia vast monthly stream of wealth shall be arrested and diverted to the aid of home manufactures, to effect a great reform and remove from the people'a shouldera the expense of supporting a small army of insurance clerks and agents. The Builders' Insurance Company has passed through its first year (the most trying) with singular success. It has gathered a hundred thousand dollars, paid promptly all its losses, and eatahlished a husiness income of fully twenty thousand dollars a month! This has heen done while we were yet hut an experiment, and enjoying the confidence of only a portion of the public. We now appeal to the entire people. We aak them to send their insurance business to us on the following conditions, and soon we shall have an income of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS A MONTH, and here is what we shall do with the money:

First, we calculate, from our present experience, that we shall lose by fire and marine disastera half our monthly income (on our first year'a experience our "losses" were hut one-third of our income.)

Suppose then that our income shall he worked up to one hundred thousand dollars a mouth, and auppose that we shall pay out losses to the exteut of fifty thousand dollars a month, we shall still havu fifty thousand dollars a month to hank up, (or half a million a year.) We propose to make two parts of this aum—one part (a quarter of a million a year) to he invested in City Bonds, to protect the assured, and one part (about a quarter of a million a ycar) we propose to convert into a

MANUFACTURERS' LOAN FUND,

Which shall he lent exclusively to manufacturers on mortgage of their premisea and machinery, at as low rate of interest and on sa long time as is generally current on real estate.

By the aid of this fund the budding industries of the Pacific States may be nourished into activo life; more and varied employments can he originated for the people; immigration may he welcomed and not feared; the farmer will have got a markct at his own door for the produce of his land; the manufacturer will find a lively home demand from the farmer for the products of his machincs.

All this, good people, can he achieved by your own votes at your own firesides, without the aid of Congresa or the Legislature—it is simply to vote that your insurance shall go to the BUILDERS', hy which vote you ahall enahle us to plant factories all over the country. You shall fill the rivers and harhors with busy ships; you shall send out upon the distant waves fishing expeditions that will hring back wealth to your cities: you ahall form a nursery of seamen around your own shores—the ova of a futuro commerce and a protective navy; you will creato the hum of husy workmen in every desirahle locality on the Pacific coast; you will bring from neglected fields produce of the utmost value; all of which will most certainly multiply a thousand fold the wealth of the country in which your lot is cast, msking a worthy home for yourselves and a future country for your offspring.

People of the Pacific States and Territories! We pledge ourselves to you to effect, with your co-operation, some of those things. We have kept all our pledges so far, and have uttered nothing that was not true. Already have we helped to move the shuttle and the loom, which others, with more means, have passed hy and neglected. Already have we helped to bnild aud rig ships in our own dock-ysrds, and sent them over the wide wsves in search of riches for the city. Already havo we given many liberal bounties and donations to the deserving institutions of the city. Give your vote to the BUILDERS', and we shall share its profits with every useful charity and every honest industry, and help along every enterprise tha t promises benefit to the people.

We call for the yeas and nays.

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL
ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhahitanta are entitled tu a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field haa decided, and the Supremo Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that tho citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead; and tho undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, hy petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead hy calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner porperty worth a large aum of money under the existing laws now in force.

BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say: "It is, therefore, now the settled law, that the municipal landa held by the city of San Francisco, as succcsaors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, hut IN TRUST for its inhabitanta"

Therefore, all the inhahitanta havo to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as thia is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.

E. L. B. BROOKS,
Attorney and Counsellor at Law.

All legal hnsiness transacted in the French and Spanish languages, if desired.

HEALTHFULNESS OF APPLES. — There is scarcely an article of the vegetable food more widely useful and more universally liked than the apple. Why every farmer in the nation has not an apple orchard where trees will grow at all, is a mystery to me. Let every housekeeper lay in a good supply of apples, and it will be a most economical investment in the way of culinaries. A raw and mellow apple is digested in an hour and a half, while boiled cabbage requires five hours. The most healthful dessert that can he placed on the table is a haked apple. If eaten frequently at breakfast, with coarse bread and butter, without meat or flesh of any kind, it has an admirable effect on the general system, often removing constipation, correcting acidities, and cooling of febrile conditions more effectually than the most approved medicines. If families could he induced to substitute apples—sound and ripe —for pies, cake and sweetmeats, with which their children are frequently stuffed, there would he a diminution in the sum total of doctor's hills, in a single year, sufficient to lay in a stock of this delicious fruit for the whole season's use.

REV. MR. ———, of Lawrence, Mass., is a hachelor. Noticing, early in the season, that one of his members, a married lady, was not at meeting for several Sahhaths, he called to ask the reason. As her reply was somewhat evasive, he surmised that she "had nothing to wear," and said, "you are waiting for your spring bonnet, I suppose." Weeks passed, and still she did not make her appearance. He therefore thought he would call again. Approaching the house, he saw her sitting at the open window, and blandly remarked, "I have not seen you at church yet; hasn't that honnet come?" "Yes, sir," she archly replied. "Shall I show it to you?" "If you please," answered the woudering parson. Holding up a wee hit of a hahy, she said, blushing: "This is the spring honnet I was waiting for."

THE DEW OF EDEN.
LADIES OF CALIFORNIA?—If you will keep your complexions in the freshness, delicacy and beauty of youth, you must use the DEW OF EDEN, for it is the only article extant that will do for those using it all that it purports without injury, as it contains no mineral or poisonous substances whatever. It preeerves the skin from the effects of climate and atmospheric changes; prevents the formation of Freckles, Tan, Morphew, Sunburn and Wrinkles. It keeps the skin soft, tender and beautiful; because it is congenial and natural to it, and composed of ingredients that supply to it what time and exposure take too rapidly away. It proserves and restores. It is valuable to the yonng, but more so to those from whom the stern hand of Time is stealing the treasures of youth; to such, it will actualy arrest its depredatious and avert its ravages upon the human face divine. It will surely smooth out those lines of csre to a great extent; and restore the skin to comparative youth. Used on the hands daily, it preserves them in all fineness of texture and delicacy of early years. It gives a beautiful tint to the nails of the fingers, and keeps them tender and soft. It is not a cosmetic, and must not be used with any kind of paint. A simple powder, however, of harmless nature, may be used without detriment with this protective.
No lady once using the DEW OF EDEN will ever afterward dispense with it from her toilet.

AN INGENIOUS SWINDLE.

We heard of an ingenious swindle the other day, says the Pittsburg Leader, practiced not long ago on a farmer residing near Alliance, on the Pittsburg and Fort Wayne railroad. One evening, two or three months ago, a stranger stopped at the farm house, and asked permisson to stay over night. This was readily granted by the hospitable farmer. A couple of hours after retiring for the night, the stranger was taken suddenly and violently ill, and for several days informed his host that during his illness he had dreamed three nights in succession that he had discovered, in a certain ravine near the house, under a rock, an earthen crock containing a large amount of silver. At this the old gentleman expressed surprise, and spoke of it as being a very mysterious dream. Afterward, however, they were walking together in that section, and the dream was again adverted to by the stranger. An examination was at once proposed by the farmer, to satisfy their curiosity. The rock was soon found, and after brushing the leaves carefully away, it was removed, and to their utter amazement there sat a crock full of silver. They took it out and conveyed it secretly to the house, and on examination it was found to contain $400, which they agreed to divide equally between them. The day after this discovery, as the stranger was about to take his leave, he complained to his benefactor of the inconvenience of carrying so much silver, when an exchange was proposed, the stranger receiving $250 in greenbacks for his share of the coin, silver then being at a premium of about 50 per cent. It was not long after the departure of his guest, however, till mine host made another discovery—his $400 in silver was counterfeit! and he had thus been ingeniously swindled out of $250. The story was kept quiet for several months, but it finally leaked out, and we now give it as we heard it.

No. 429 JACKSON STREET, between Sansome and Montgomery.

The Ladies are of one mind in pronouncing BOWMAN'S AMERICAN WASHING COMPOUND the best preparation for washing and cleaning in use. It is acknowledged to be a saving both in money and labor. The Compound softens the dirt, consequently the clothes require not more than one-half the rubbing necessary in washing by the old method; besides all who give it a trial acknowledge that their clothes are made whiter in washing with this Compound, than they were ever known to be by using any other preparation. For washing Woolen Goods and Flannels it cannot be equaled. Calicoes that can be washed with soap, without fading, are washed in the water used for boiling the white clothes. This Compound has been used in the eastern States for the past three years with perfect success. Warranted not to injure the clothes. For sale by all Grocers.

AYER'S PILLS

ARE PARTICULARLY ADAPTED to derangements of the Digestive Apparatus, and diseases arising from Impurity of the Blood. A large part of all the complaints that afflict mankind originate in one of these, and consequently these PILLS are found to cure many varieties of Disease. They are sugar-coated, and hence may be taken readily by the most sensitive and delicate persons.

Subjoined are the statements from some eminent physicians, of their effects in their practice:

AS A FAMILY PHYSIC.

From Dr. E. W. Cartwright, of New Orleans—Your Pills are the prince of purges. Their excellent qualities surpass any cathartic we possess. They are mild, but very certain and effectual in their action on the bowels, which makes them invaluable to us in the daily treatment of disease.

FOR JAUNDICE AND ALL LIVER COMPLAINTS.

From Dr. Theodore Bell, of New York City—Not only are your Pills admirably adapted to their purpose as an aperient, but I find their beneficial effects upon the Liver very marked indeed. They have in my practice proved more effectual for the cure of Bilious Complaints than any one remedy I can mention. I sincerely rejoice that we have at length a purgative which is worthy the confidence of the professiou and the people.

DYSPEPSIA—INDIGESTION.

From Dr. Henry J. Knox, of St. Louis—The Pills you were kind enough to send me have been all used in my practice, and have satisfied me that they are truly an extraordinary medicine. So peculiarly are they adapted to the diseases of the human system, that they seem to work upon them alone. I have cured some cases of Dyspepsia and Indigestion with them, which had resisted the other remedies we commonly use. Indeed I have experimentally found them to be effectual in almost all the complaints for which you recommend them.

FOR HEADACHE—SICK HEADACHE—FOUL STOMACH—PILES—DROPSY—PLETHORA—PARALYSIS—FITS—DYSENTERY—DIARRHŒA—RELAXATION, ETC., ETC.

From Dr. Edward Boyd, Baltimore—Dear Dr. Ayer: I cannot answer you what complaints I have cured with your Pills better than to say all that we ever treat with a purgative medicine. I place great dependence on an effectual cathartic in my daily contest with disease, and believe as I do that your Pills afford us the best we have, I of course value them highly.

☞ Most of the Pills in market contain mercury, which although a valuable remedy in skillful hands, is dangerous in a public pill, from the dreadful consequences that frequently follow its incautious use. These contain no mercury or mineral substances whatever.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine everywhere.

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.

QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secrecy, and all Sexual Disorders.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secresy.

TO FEMALES.

When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, she should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about her troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.

If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.

Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,

W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.,
San Francisco, Cal.

SPERMATORRHŒA.

DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs

This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of Six Cents in Postage Stamps for return postage. Address,

ALLOPATHIC SLANDERS
On Homœopathy Refuted.

The "Pacific Medical and Surgical Journal" of this city, in an editorial in the number of the present month, tries to give currency to a groundless accusation, to the effect that those who practice medicine according to the Homœopathic law are ignorant of and obliged to dispense with operatic surgery, and trust to "infinitisimal doses" for the cure of cataract broken limbs, etc.! To prove that this attempted fraud on that portion of the public who are unacquainted with the subject is prompted by disappointment and jealousy, I publish the following "announcements" of six Homœopathic Colleges in the United States, with their respective Faculties, each College being a legally chartered institution in the State to which it belongs, and in possession of all the rights and privileges of Allopathic Colleges.

In the matter of the Estate of HENRY MONTGOMERY, deceased.
Order to show cause why Order of Sale of Real Estate should not be made.
It appearing to the said Court, by the petition this day presented and filed by James Dulfey, the Administrator of the estate left unadministered of HENRY MONTGOMERY, deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole or some portion of the real estate, to pay the allowance to the family, the debts outstanding against the deceased, and the debts, expenses and charges of administration.
It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Probate Court on MONDAY, the 11th day of November, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Court room of said Probate Court, at the City Hall in the city and county of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator of the estate left unadministered, to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased as shall be necessary;
And that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a weekly newspaper printed and published in said city and county.

WINTER HAS COME.

GREEN was the bank of the stream where I lay,
With an unbaited hook;
Merry the laugh that wafted that way,
From the ford of the brook.
But oh! who would have thought, that bright morning of Spring,
That such innocent merriment ever would bring
Such Winter as this which has come!

Mown were the meadows, and perfume of hay
Carried upward our vow;
Fruitful the harvest, and happy the day—
Ah, so far distant now!
When we stood by the elm at the foot of the glade,
Till the twilight descending threw o'er us a shade—
Sad omen of what was to come!

Sear were the leaflets, and yellow the dale,
As we stood by the stile.
Who knows what fingers had woven the veil
Fell between us the while!
Had that sorrowing eye but begotten a tear,
Had my lowering brow but a moment been clear,
This Winter would never have come.

Mournfully murmured the wind in the dell,
As it sympathy sighed;
Winter came down as that final "farewell"
Was re-echoed and died.
Will it, gloomy and desolate, never depart,
With its icicle fingers, away from my heart,
This Winter that long has been there?

Love and Ventriloquism.

The followiuging advertisement appears in a New York paper:

LOVE! LOVE!—Full instructions by which any person can master the great art of Ventriloquism, and win undying love of the fair sex in a few hours practice in every case, or money refunded. Send by mail, postage paid for 50 cents. Address M. A. JAGGERS.

Is there any connection between love and ventriloquism? We appeal to Jaggers. We have heard a cynical young lady remark that the only way to gain an Englishman's affections was to please his stomach, that the materialistic Britisher preferred pie-crust to poetry, and loved the woman whose genius was evinced rather in cooking a beefsteak than in writing essays on political economy. But is the language of love to come from the stomach Jaggers? Can a man by ventriloquially declaring his affection "win undying love in a few hours practice, in every case, or money refunded?"

The idea that the heart is the seat of affections was of course exploded long ago. Everyone knows that love affects the stomach more than it does the heart, and believes that in all probability the pang of love are felt by that important member of the human body. Perhaps then Jaggers is right, perhaps instead of "the heart declaring its passion," the stomach should do the talking. If this theory be correct, how useful then is it to learn the art of ventriloquism! Send fifty cents to Jaggers (we won't give Jaggers' address) and receive in return instructions which will enable you to make ventriloquial love, and gain the undying love of the fair sex.

A Pocket Railroad:

The great Hah-ya-takee, when he traveled to San Jose the other day by rail, expressed his astonishment and delight at the speed of the locomotive, and asked the interpreter if he couldn't buy the railroad—he wouldn't mind giving five hundred dollars for it; he wanted to have it packed up so that he might conveniently transport it to Japan. The interpreter told him that he would do all he could in the matter, but he was afraid that the San Jose Railroad Company wouldn't sell out for five hundred dollars, to accomodate the great Ha-yah-takee, and enable him to return to Japan with a railroad in his pocket,

An Interesting Event.

We have been grieved and disappointed by the neglect of the city press. It is three weeks since it was born—not a word has been said about it in the newspapers which chronicled the fact that Mrs. Lincoln had been a little extravagant, and has been forced by the pressure of circumstances to apply to that great universal relative her "uncle" and "pop" "above up the sport," "impignorate" or whatever you like to call it, her jewelry. It is sad. We will not be so neglectful, although we must own that we should have announced the interesting event long, long ago; only yesterday, we walked down to North Beach for the express purpose of seeing it. We had heard of it. It was pronounced by those who had seen it to be—well, we went down. Not a word had been said in any paper, excepting the German Democrat, a paper which is especially devoted to Democrats and—but there it was, like, oh! horribly like a black baby; there was "Minnie," the happy mother monkey, nursing a sweet little cherub who cried as melodiously as any of his white cousins, and had no soothing syrup administered to him. The proud papa, "Pete." sits on a small soap box far away from his bride, and when his offspring is admired, by grinning and chattering, calls the attention of the bystanders to the fact that it is "the image of its father." There is a wicked old monkey called "Jeff. Davis," confined in a cage—no Horace Greely having, as yet, offered himself as bail. We feared that Jeff. did not get as many peanuts, apples, and other delicacies, as his more amiable com-patriots who swing by their tails, jump, and otherwise exert themselves, to amuse the San Francisco public, and made inquiries concerning him. We were assured by the manager of the small menagerie, that "Jeff's" imprisonment, though irksome, was necessary, and that his daily rations were most bountiful in quantity, and liberal with regard to quality. On only one occasion was he insulted; the keeper detailed to take him his food, ventured to make an insulting remark to the noble captive, and "Jeff." incontinently pasted him in the bugle with an apple left from his morning rations. "Jeff." is a confirmed old bachelor, and would with pleasure eat the monkey baby if it ever happened to come within his reach. "Minnie" is a little afraid of "Jeff.," and careful that the small monkey shall not ever leave her arms. It is a pretty, intelligent looking, and very interesting little monkey, and even if it can never hope to obtain a vote, should be regarded with interest as a native born Californian.

A Hint for Fitz Smythe.

Fitz Smythe's manner of recording thefts, murders and other crimes is lively, he is very funny, but he might still improve his style by studying the New York papers. Fitz Smythe published the following in yesterday's Alta:

Charles Coates was caught with a pretty little toy, called a sling shot, and will be told hereafter how much he must pay for indulging his peculiar fancy for amusement,

Mrs. O'Brien spoke to William Brit after a style which sounded harshly and unnatural in his virtuous ears, and therefore he procured her arrest. The Judge established her naughty use of language, which in this case did not disguise her thoughts, by imposing a fine of $10.

That is very good, but it is not nearly so high flavored as the following, which we clip from an Eastern paper:

"Big Moll Johnson, the Amazon of 'Hooker's division,' a 'rusty' old 'gin pig,' 'lost to virtue and wedded to sin,' was before the 'heakquere' at the Central last night, for creating a disturbance at the 'snoozing ken' No. 152 C street. Moll's 'moneker' was in the Huey a week or two ago for shooting a U. S. 'cove.' She is without exception the 'rustiest zuke' in Washington. Some idea of the powers of this 'hloss' can be formed from the fact that it required three or four of our best 'coppers' (fly cop McDevitt, Roth and Leach) to 'run her in,' she fighting all the way to the 'booby hatch' like a catamount."

That is the sort of writing which would make the Alta a popular paper. Fitz calls a policeman "an active officer;" he should term him a "fly cop." He has never yet called him a "heakquere." Oh, bah! how stale, flat and unprofitable appear all Fitz Smythe's attempts at spicy writing when compared with the productions of this New York local items.

The Age of Shams.

It is all very fine to talk about the sham breasts, sham calves, sham ears, sham everythings of the ladies, but do not gentlemen practice as much deceit? There are at present in San Francisco at least six gentlemen who pad their calfs (or calves, which is right,) and as to shams in the way of paper, it is perfectly disgraceful. We know of one nice-looking young man in this city who never wears a shirt; he wears a paper collar, and paper cuffs, and walks about the streets with an air of gentlemanly effrontery, which leads people to believe can tell where the paper imitations will stop. When waterfalls—no, "chignons"—are made out of paper and resemble the natural hair so that he is a capitalist. This paper is a terrible invention. No one closely as to defy detection, one does not know what may be done next. At present all a man requires to enable him to make a respectable appearance, is two paper collars and an undershirt.

Once More Dead.

Every one in San Francisco must remember the performing mules, Barney and Pete, which have been attached to various circuses which have visited this State for the last ten years. These remarkable mules die periodically. Pete has died three times to our knowledge, Barney is not so good on the die as Pete, he has only died once. It is not the slightest consequence, however, how often either one or the other of these famous mules die, they are both alive and kicking the next day. The last account of the death of one of them, we don't know whether the corpse is that of Barney or Petee, we clip from the last number of the Santa Cruz Times.

"DEAD.—The celebrated trick mule of Ryland & Lee's circus company, which has traveled throughout the United States, South America and Australia, died a few days since in the cattle-market pasture, near Haywood." TREM.

A NIGHT BEFORE PORT HUDSON.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

[Captain James Franklin Fitts, who served for four years in active duty in the Union army during the late war, is writing "Recollections of the War" for the Boston Flag of Our Union. Captain Fitts' sketches of army-life and experiences, several of which we have published in THE CALIFORNIAN before, are peculiarly graphic and interesting, and are entirely free from that exaggerated and mock heroic tone which is so common to most war stories. The subjoined article will be followed next week by a companion sketch detailing his experiences at the assault of Port Hudson.]

IF the reader can fancy what his feelings would be should he be called up from a comfortable slumber of a cold night, with the intelligence that the roof was blazing overhead, and the stairway burned away beneath him, he will be in the neighborhood of the sensations which the soldier experiences when aroused by the long-roll of the sergeant-major, to fight a battle.

A great many pretty descriptions of battles have been written by men who never shouldered a musket or carried a sword, and there is reason to fear that the public, even in this day of great military experience, look upon the soldier as a rattle-brained, harum-scarum, O'Malleyish kind of a fellow, always spoiling for a fight, and never entirely happy when not up to his neck in blood and glory. But I think that any amateur military writer, whose imagination ever led him into wild fights after the sensational in war, would have become thoroughly sick of that kind of business, had he been with us before Port Hudson on the 10th of June, 1863.

Almost two weeks' familiarity with the excitements and dangers of sharpshooting had quieted our nerves so that the we were able to sleep soundly at night, whether the muskets cracked and clattered the night long, or only in occasional spits of spite. The details in the rifle-pits watched carefully, while the mass of us enjoyed the only enjoyable hours which came to the place—those devoted to sleep. And how we did luxuriate in the few hours' repose which we were allowed from those dusty, smoke-blackened, bullet-scarred rifle-pits! With legs aching from the continual strain of standing at the loop-holes, with arms aching from steady use of the rammer, with shoulders aching from the recoil of the musket, loaded with a double charge of powder, to drive the minnie ball more surely into Port Hudson, with eyes aching from intently watching for a human mark to shoot at, and with every nerve in the system aching and throbbing under the weight of excitement that burdened it all through the hours of daylight—with all this aggregation of fatigue and pain, it was as grateful as it was easy for the soldier to throw himself down on the ground, wrap his blanket about him, and enjoy such a sleep as no feather-bed ever afforded him. Those of us who had read Don Quixote joined heartily in Sancho's benediction on "the man who first invented sleep;" and those of us who had not realized the sentiment quite as well.

I thought of all this on the night of the 9th of June, about nine o'clock, as I lay down to sleep, with no covering but the branches of the trees and the heavens overhead. About three hours must have passed, and I was sleeping so sweetly and soundly that the waking of me for anything short of a matter of life or death would have been a crime, when a voice sounded faintly in my air.

"Captain," it said. The sergeant-major tells me that I scowled in my sleep, muttered something about deploying the company as skirmishers, and turned over.

"Cap, wake up!" This time I was shaken by the shoulder, and I awoke to recognize my old persecutor, the sergeant-major.

"Well, what now? What mischiefs and torments do you announce?" I asked, sitting upright.

"Company to fall in under arms immediately," he said.

"At this time of night? Know what for?"

"No. They say it's an assault; but it's not certain."

"And what shall we do when under arms?"

"Move into the rifle-pits, and wait for further orders." And with these words, he moved on to carry his orders elsewhere.

I crawled in the darkness over to the spot where my orderly-sergeant slept, and, waking him, gave him the orders, and told him to hasten the men with all possible despatch. Then I crawled back, put on my blouse, buckled on my sword-belt, examined the cartridges in my revolver, to see that they could be depended on, and leaning against a tree, occupied the minute which the company required for falling in and calling the roll, with a few very serious reflections. As to the meaning of these orders, I had no doubt. I supposed, beyond question, they would be followed by another to attack and carry the enemy's works. It was an order we had expected for the past week; but I can hardly say that the time chosen for the work was particularly acceptable. So far as my own experience goes, soldiers have a deep distaste for night-fighting. To be sure, they have that shelter in the darkness which they never have in daylight; but a position by assault, the light of day seemed to me to be indispensable. I feared that in the first rush and fury of the assault friends and foes would become mingled together, and that our blows and balls would fall in the darkness upon each other, leading to disaster and confusion. The thought of the precaution of which I had read somewhere—the tying of a piece of tape or string about the arm, suggested itself to me; but I heard the voice of the adjutant, hurrying the companies on the right, knew there was no time left for suggestion of this kind.

"Well," was my unspoken thought, as I faced the company to the right, and moved it into the rifle-pits, "I am very glad indeed that I don't command this army, and have not the responsibility of speaking the word that will devote hundreds of these boys to death and wounds. One company is quite as large a command as I desire, for such a mission as this, at such a time."

But I congratulated myself too early, for I found in the rifle-pits but two other companies of the regiment, and was informed by their officers that only these three were ordered out. I was the senior officer present, and therefore commanded the detachment during the exciting and perilous hours which followed.

The next three minutes were minutes of profound silence; they were like the hush that fills the air just before the descent of the white squall upon the sea. The men grasped their muskets, and peered curiously into the darkness between us and the enemy; some had clambered upon the top of the work, which in the daytime was forbidden ground, and the officers stood in silence together, waiting for the word to advance. I looked over into the yawning gulf that separated us from the hills which were crowned by the enemy's defences, and drew very little encouragement from the recollection of the nature of the place, as we had seen it by daylight. It was a great irregular pit, bare of trees, save a few solitary growths on the slopes of the hills, but choked with rocks, felled with timber, brambles and stumps, and seamed with deep gullies and wet ditches. All these obstacles must be blundered over in the darkness; we must descend our own hills, and ascend those of the enemy, in the teeth of a driving storm of lead, before we could reach their works; and then—

The voice of the colonel broke in upon my reflections. He had entered the rifle-pit, and took a hasty look at the companies.

"A, F and D?" he said interrogatively. "Yes—this is right. Now, then, gentlemen, move your men forward. Straight forward, you understand. The other seven will stay in the rifle-pits to cover your advance."

"But, colonel," I interposed, "what are we to do? Are there no particular orders? Is it to be an assault, in good earnest, or only a feint?"

"The fact is, captain, I don't know. It's a shame to deliver orders in this bungling way; but I give them just as they came to me from brigade headquarters. But you must move, at all events. See! they are moving on the right and left of you. Forward!"

The night was not of that kind commonly known as pitch-dark; it was one of hazy obscurity. We could distinguish bodies at some distance, although features were not recognizable at arm's length. As the colonel spoke, I saw a mass of figures to the right and left form over our own works in irregular order, and move silently down the hill.

"Forward!" I repeated in a whisper, and clambered over the logs which topped the embankment, dropping down seven feet outside, with my sword in my teeth.

By half-dozens the officers and men came after me; and, without stopping to form them in regular order, I led them down the steep face of the hill. We had progressed but a few rods, before I discovered a skirmish-line deploying towards us from the right; and I hailed it in a subdued voice.

"Ho—what regiment there?"

"One Hundred and Sixteenth New York," came back the answer, in the familiar voice of Lieutenant S——; and immediately we met at the bottom of the hill.

"What are your orders?" I asked.

"To deploy as skirmishers, and advance," he answered.

"Nothing more?"

"Not a word."

"Well—move slowly, and I will connect with your left." And, hastening back to my command, I gave the order to deploy as skirmishers, taking intervals to both right and left, which the men proceeded to do.

This skirmishing, the reader will understand, is not altogether a bad business, when prosecuted in daylight, over a level plain, or through a piece of woods. The line moves forward at easy pace, the men scattered along it, each at least six paces from his next neighbor; every one may take any shelter that falls in his way behind which to load or fire, or he may throw himself flat on the earth; he is expected to fire only when he sees a reasonable prospect of hitting an enemy, and to keep himself as well sheltered as the nature of the ground and circumstances will permit. But when it comes to moving up a skirmishing-line in the dark, through and over all kinds of obstacles, pitfalls and entanglements, with no hope of keeping any connection in it, and towards an enemy whose exact-location you are very uncertain about—then it is a very distasteful business, and one which is never coveted, either by officers or men.

But my few words with Lieutenant S——had elicited one fact which I was not sorry to learn. There was to be no assault to-night. General Banks never intended to carry Port Hudson with a skirmish-line; of that I was quite positive. It was, as I had begun to suspect before leaving our works, a demonstration, intended for some purpose which was doubtless well known by the generals, and which it was not necessary that we should know. It would be idle to say that I did not feel relieved by this conviction. I think I shared in the vigorous esprit du corps which characterized this command, and realized as thoroughly as any other of it, there must be a fight, and a very bloody and desperate one, before the stars and bars which we saw daily waiving from the summit of the tallest tree within the rebel ports would come down. I knew well enough that the day must come; but to use a Hibernicism, I preferred that it should not come in the night-time.

As the skirmishers spread out, I followed them closely. We were now well nigh the bottom of the pit, and the long, broken bridge, with the rebel embankments dimly defined upon it, frowned almost over us.

"Keep a little more to the right," I said, in the suppressed voice in which I had hitherto spoken. "There is a quiet gap between us and—"

That sentence was never finished. The gap I spoke of was in the skirmish-line, and nobody was near enough to warn one that I was standing on a rock, and that a gap of quite as much importance to me was directly at my feet. The next step that I took was about two yards in length; I floundered off that treacherous rock, without warning, my sword flying out of my hand, my head bumping, and the scabbard banging against the rock in my descent, and myself bringing up on all fours in a clump of brambles which cruelly gashed my lips and tore a liberal piece from the skirt of my blouse. I was somewhat bruised, and not a little lacerated in temper; but there was no time now for the washing of wounds. Recovering my sword, I crept on several yards further, listening with real amusement, spite of the gravity of our situation, to the exclamations uttered in subdued tones by the men, as they also bruised and scratched themselves against the thickening difficulties of the abbatis.

"Hang it, John, come back here!" I heard one of them call out in a loud whisper. "Here I am, on the ground, with my shoulder-belt fast in this infernal root. Come and help me up."

"Yes--quick as I find my bayonet. Belt and bayonet both went together into these brambles."

"Curse the man who first settled Port Hudson!" an irate corporal observed. "There's a gash on my cheek as big as a sabre-cut. These brambles are awful."

"Where's cap?"

"Near by, I guess; he'll turn up. Get along men," replied one of the file-closers.

Some distance to the right, where I supposed the ground was clearer, and where the advance might be made with less labor, we had heard several musket-shots, without which the rebels could hardly been apprised of our advance. But now, while we struggled to extricate ourselves from the obstacles which lay thick beneath and before us, a single flash from a distant point of the enemy's line faintly illumined this pit of torment in which we were laboring, and the roar of a thirty-pounder echoed through the night. By the light of that flash, I saw long black lines of heads and shoulders projected over the rebel works; and they must have seen a small army of blue blouses scattered about through the pit, and crawling through and over its impediments up toward their works. The scene which followed was one which mocks all written description, and shames language into silence. In its suddenness and startling fury, the uproar that then shook the air, breaking in as it did upon the hush of night, has never been surpassed in all my experience. Could I have witnessed that spectacle as a mere spectator, in a safe position, instead of that which I held as one of its actors, I know I should have found its dramatic effect terribly grand. Long jets of fire suddenly flashed out in irregular bursts from every part of the works before us, and the discordant crash of musketry for the next fifteen minutes seemed to fill the whole atmosphere. And no sooner did the rebels open upon us, than there came a response from our friends behind us.

If the reader can imagine himself the center of a great open cavern, over which the sky is arched in a low dome, and then imagine the sky filled with incessant flashes of light, and an uninterrupted crash of thunder, all so near him that every flash threatens to scorch and every peal to smite him, he will gain an idea of our situation. The uproar and the sense of danger from the clouds of bullets that hissed through the air would have been frightful enough had it all proceeded from the front; but our peril was nearly as great from our friends as from our foes. The darkness was deep enough to make the men in our own rifle-pits uncertain of the precise line of fire, and probably one-third of their balls struck nearer to us than to the enemy. It would have been folly to proceed, under the circumstances, and the whole skirmish-line halted and lay low, every man seeking the best shelter he could obtain. As I lay prone to the ground, it seemed as though every spot about me was struck by a bullet. They sprang and whistled in the air overhead like a swarm of maddened bees, and their dull thud as they pierced the ground, or struck the logs and rocks, was too frequent to be counted. Under this terrific cross-fire we lay helpless for at least half an hour, every man feeling like a victim who was certain to be sacrificed, sooner or later. My men were injured only by slight wounds—none were killed, owing, it may be, to the fact that they were well protected; but at other points of the line there were many who lay down beneath that fire, and never rose again, and many more who crawled and limped back to our works, sorely smitten. We could hear the voices of these latter, as they called to the men in our rifle-pits not to shoot them while they were retreating; and some who tried to make their way back, faint and bleeding, were struck dead before reaching the cover of earthworks, fell on the slope, where they were afterwards found riddled with balls.

Gradually the firing slackened on both sides, and was heard only in scattered shots. I crawled a little forward, and found my men well sheltered in a wet ditch, which must have been the lowest ground of the pit, as a little stream of water was running through it. The bank nearest the rebels was of sufficient height to afford complete protection to those who hugged it closely; but some were forced to sit in the water, to secure this protection. I peeped cautiously over the edge, and found myself already near enough to the enemy's position to be comfortable. The hill rose up abruptly from the ditch; and upon it, not more than the distance of a good stone's throw, at least, eight figures were moving about, while voices, though not words, could be heard distinctly.

"We can pick off every mother's son of 'em!" Sergeant W—— whispered, as he stood on tip-toe by me, and half-cocked his rifle. "There's that chap pointing with his arm—I think he's an officer. Shall I fetch him?"

The temptation to order a dozen of the best sharp-shooters in those three companies up to the edge of this ditch, and by one well-directed volley destroy the whole party, was strong; but inclination took counsel of judgment, and said no. Well satisfied as I was that our movement was merely a feint or a reconnoissance, I knew it would be wrong to incur so grave a risk for the sake of killing a few enemies. The discharge of three muskets from that ditch would have instantly centered upon us an enfilading fire which would probably have killed every man of us. Out of prudence, therefore, I restrained the men; but should these lines meet the eye of some Mississippian, Arkansian or Louisianian who was upon that hill that morning, he will know how narrow was his escape from death.

I looked at my watch; it was but a little past two o'clock. Here we were, crowded together in that wretched ditch, standing, sitting, and even lying in the water, without orders, and not knowing what to do next. Lieutenant S—— was still on our right, and a few whispered sentences with him soon informed me that he was in the same quandary with ourselves.

That was all very well; but I had begun to seriously fear that we should never get any orders to deliver us from this woeful predicament into which somebody's blunder had cast us. The conviction grew so strong, that I resolved to take the hazard of going back for them. It might be that messengers were out searching for us, who were unable to find us in the darkness. Whispering my intention to the officer next in rank to myself, I crawled out of the ditch, and began to ascend, on hands and knees, the slope down which we had tumbled and wandered an hour before. I made the way rather long, anxious as I was to keep the shelter of rocks, logs, brambles and grass, and so "snaked" along toward the top, as I had read of Indians and hunters spying upon each other. All such experiences are much more delightful to read about than to practice, however; and I resolved on the spot that the noble red men were welcome to all that kind of fun they could find: I wanted no more of it. Stray balls fell uncomfortably near me all the way, and as I placed my hand on a log, to assist me in this "snaking" progress, a bullet sank into the other end of it, making it tremble beneath my fingers.

As I neared our lines, the fear that I might be taken for an enemy grew strong, and I softly called out—Ho there—One Hundred and Fourteenth.?"

"Ay, ay!" was the welcome response; and, with a hurried caution that I was Captain F——, and they need not shoot, I rushed over the intervening space and tumbled inside the work into the midst of Company G.

"The Lord save us!" ejaculated the lieutenant. "So you're not dead I thought you were all dead by this time."

"No," I retorted. "But little thanks to you fellows that we are not. You shoot awfully wild to-night."

"Well, we can't help it," he returned apologetically, "in this darkness. But we had orders a few minutes ago to suspend firing."

"Where's the colonel," I asked.

"Here," he answered for himself. And in halt a minute I bad explained to him the exact uature of our situation, and demanded to know what was expected from us.

"That's just what I'd like to know myself," he answered slapping his leg with angry excitement. "I've sent over to the brigade headquarters twice, and can't get a word from them. Everything goes wrong to-night. However, I suppose you'll be ordered back presently. Return to your detachment and in the absence of orders, do as you see others do."

Very little comforted by these indefinite instructions, which were still the best that my very excellent colonel could give me, I blundered down the hill, and into the ditcb again, and told the men what I had learned.

"We'll stay here until daylight, if we're not ordered back. In fact, I think I'd like to stay a week or so in such a delightful spot."

My poor attempt at wit raised a feeble chuckle and the men settled themselves down to the holding of this vile situation as manfully as though we had been accomplishing any real good there. My words were dolefully prophetic; stay there till daylight we did, and a very dismal three bours we had of it. We could only talk in whispers, for fear of being overheard by the enemy; we could only sit or stand in a constrained position for fear of being seen and sbot; so tbe most of us lapsed into moody silence—one of the boys afterwards declaring that in that interval of time he tbought about everything that had ever happened to him since be was two years and six montbs old, while another said he spent the whole time wisbing he was in Widow Blake's front parlor in ——— county, with Susan.

The easy nonchalance of tbe soldier comes out queerly on occasions like this. We are often told that the wants of the body are entirely repressed during times of great mental tension; but every soldier knows the contrary. There was not a man of us then in that horrible bole who did not realize tbe fact that he was likely enougb to get a bullet through his body the next minute; and there was not one who was not voraciously hungry. In fact, I have often tbought that excitement tends as strongly to hunger as does labor. One of the men had been thoughtful enougb to bring a haversack of hard tack and raw pork with him, wbich was now passed freely around. In less than a month from that morning, I dined at the Metropolitan in New York, witb less real satisfaction than the eujoyment of this barbarous luncb at tbe bottom of that ditch gave me.

As the morning wore on, fatigue insensibly overpowered me, and lying there in four inches of water, and with occasional bullets thumping the ground about me, I enjoyed several five-minute naps, as did also others around me. A slight drizzling rain had commenced; but it added little to our discomforts; they were bardly capable of any additions.

Four o'clock at last. There is a plain, hunting-cased watch on the table before me as I write: it was my faithful companion for almost four years in tbe war, making time for me in many battles and skirmishes; and it told me that daylight was approaching on that memorable 10th of Jnne. And still no orders. The misty obscurity of the night was fast giving place to the first dull transclucent gray of dawn, and I peered warily down the gorge to see what others were doing. I heard the report of several muskets as I did so, and quickly an irregular discharge all along the enemy's line began; nor was it long before a piece of artillery somewhat to the rigbt of us began belching out grape and canister. The cause of tbis reopening of the fight was quickly apparent; the line was retiring, and as the ligbt of day grew broader, I could see our men retreating in all possible shapes—some rushing np the slope and over the work as fast as possible, a few taking it coolly and leisurely, as tbougb tbere was nothing to be alarmed about, and others getting on all fours throngb tbe grass and brambles. The sight would bave been laughable had it not possessed so large an element of the tragic.

"Now then, boys, get out of this!" I exclaimed, turning sharply upon them. "Tbe line is retiring, and I'll go with it, orders or no orders. Now or never! Who goes first?"

Not a man moved; not a man spoke. There were no braver fellows in Banks' army; but tbe idea of retreating up that bullet-scarred slope was disheartening, and all were reluctant to move. But I could not besitate, the situatiou grew worse and worse as the light increased.

"Start along, Brown—quick!" I said to a stalwart fellow and seized him by the arm. He sprang out of the ditch, and rushed up the slope and over the work, amid the patter of bullets; and a sbout from tbe inside announced his safety. "Now Smitb, now Jones—scamper, and the Lord protect you!" And tbey too went, amidst a sharp fusilade.

In this manner I urged tbem out, three or four at a time; and though it seemed to me then as if the wbole face of that slope were swept by rebel balls, every enlisted man of those three companies escaped with his life, and not one received a serious wound; wbile at other points of the line, corpses clad in blue were lying all over the hill. Such are the strange chances of war. Our riflemen were answering vigorously, trying to cover our retreat, and I have no doubt that their fire did large damage to the enemy.

There were now only the three officers who had accompanied the detachment left in the ditch—Captain Knowlton, Lieutenant Stafford and myself. The former escaped with me the accumulated dangers of the night; but sixteen months later, in front of the bloody battle of Cedar Creek, Virginia, he fell at my side, pierced through the brain by a rifle-ball.

"Every man for himself, now gentlemen," I said. "Good by, if I shouldu't see either of you again." And I bounded out of the ditch and across the little bollow that intervened between it and the slope.

It is much easier for a soldier to have faitb in presentments than any other person; and my presentment now was that I should escape unharmed. It was so strong that I sought no cover or concealment. I took an easy double quick right up the face of the hill, while the bullets shrieked after me, and sent up little feathers of dust around my feet. I felt an unaccountable conviction that I should not be hit, and I was not; but I hereby solemnly acquit the Confederate soldiers over in the rifle-pits opposite of any dereliction of duty in the matter. If ever men tried harder to kill a fellow-mortal than did those fellows to kill me, I have not seen the effort displayed. Near the top of the hill I picked up three rubber blankets, dropped by some of tbe men in their haste, and, firing a discharge from my revolver, as a little piece of brava do in answer to the great gun opposite which was again scattering grape all over the hill, I jumped inside of the rifle-pit into the arms of Company G, amid cries of "Bully for you!" "Safe by thunder!" and the like, from the soldiers who had watched my progress up the hill with breathless interest through the loopholes.

Captain Knowlton came in unharmed, about the same time. Lieutenant Stafford was not so fortunate. He ascended the hill not three rods behind me, aud was passing over the earthwork at the precise point where I had entered it. Just as he stooped for a jump, a bullet struck bim near the hip, completely traversing his body. It was a grievous wound, whicb incapacitated him for further service, and which has made him a cripple for life.

And thus ended one of the most perilous and disagreeable nights tbat I can now remember, during the course of my military experience. Tbe intention of this demonstration was to compel the enemy to unmask his artillery; and in this it was a success. Our own artillerists hammered away more vigorously than ever after it, and dismounted many of the rebel pieces that had showered their compliments upon us that morning. The movement was also intended to cover the operatious of a large working-party, which was silently and expeditiously cutting a sunken road through the base of a hill over to the left, through which General Banks was designing to push a heavy assaulting column up to the rebel position. One of this party was Corporal Medbury, of my own company. A bullet from a volley struck him just under the sboulder-blade, entering the body, and making what the surgeon unhesitatingly pronounced a mortal wound. He was sent down the river, and none of us ever expected to see him again alive; but when, a week afterwards, I was placed in one of the wards of St. James' Hospital, New Orleans, Corporal Medbury was tbe first man to visit me. He looked very pale, but was able to walk, and said that the doctor did not think bis wound even dangerous. For another week, after this, be continued to improve, when a relapse came on, beneath which be died the second day. A post mortem examination revealed tbe astonishing fact that the bullet bad traversed both lungs, and that gangrene had at last killed him. Tbat be died is not at all strange; but that he could live two weeks, and apparently be convalescent, with his lungs torn by an ounce ball, is one of the curiosities of human anatomy.

Tbe question will naturally be asked, wby was not the whole line witbdrawn before daylight, as it might have been, without loss? The reader may be sure that I asked that question, and asked it in no gentle terms; and the colonel answered it, with his voice trembling, aud indignant tears standing in his eyes:

"Captain, it's the most sbameful thing of all tbis wretcbed night. Colonel ——, who is in temporary command of the brigade, just told me that he intended to send the order out long before daylight; but he overslept himself! Confound such an officer! I wisb be might not sleep another wink for fifteen years. It makes me feel wolfish!"

As it did us. But tbe life and limbs of a soldier are always at the mercy of trifles as insignificant as tbeir consequences may be momentons.

Our jarring passions, onr variable humors, our greater or lesser degree of health and spirits, prodnce such contradictions in onr conduct, that I believe those are oftenest mistaken who ascribe our actions to tbe most seemingly obvious motives; and I am convinced tbat a light supper, a good night's sleep, and a fiue morning, have sometimes made a hero of the same man who, by an indigeston, a restless night, and a rainy morning, would have proved a coward.—Chesterfield.

No man is ever indifferent in regard to the world's good opinion until he has lost all claim to it.

THE AMERICAN LADIES.

HEPWORTH DIXON, in his work on the United States, thus discourses of American women:

When looking at these sweet New England girls as they go trooping past my window, I cannot help feeling that with this delicate pallor, winsome and poetic as it looks to an artist in female beauty, there must be lack of vital power. My saucy friend had got an inkling of the truth. Would that these dainty cousins of ours were a trifle more robust! I could forgive them for a little roseblush on the cheek; at present you can hardly speak to them without fearing lest they should vanish from before your voice.* * * * * Among the higher classes in America, the traditions of English beauty bave not declined; the oval face, the delicate lip, the transparent nostril, the pearl-like face, the tiny hand, wbich mark in May Fair the lady of high descent, may be seen in all the best houses of Virginia and Massachusetts. The proudest London belle, the fairest Lancashire witch, would find in Boston and in Richmond rivals in grace and beauty whom she could not feign to despise. Birth is one cause, no doubt, though training and prosperity have come in aid of birth. In some of our older colonies the people drew their blood from the beart of England in her most heroic time and mood, when men who were born of gentle mothers flung themselves into great adventure for establishing new States. The bands who came out under Raleigh's patent, under Brewster's guidance, were made up of soldiers, preachers, courtiers, gentlemen; some coming hither to seek a fortune, others to find an asylum; and, though crowds of less noble emigrants followed after them—farmers, craftsmen, menials, moss troopers, and even criminals—the leaven was not wholly lost. Tbe family names remained. Even now this older race of settlers keeps its force in some degree intact; making the women lovely, tbe men gallant and enduring, in the fashion of their ancient types. This higher range of female beauty, which is chiefly to be found in the older cities and in families of gentle race, is thoroughly English in its style, reminding the stranger of a gallery of portraits in a country house; here of Holbein and Lely, there of Gainsborougb and Reynolds.—Leslie, I think, brought some of his sweetest Englisb faces from the United States.

In many of tbe younger cities of the Union there is also a great deal of beauty, backed by a good deal of wit and accomplishment; but the beauty of these younger cities (at least that sample of it which I see here in Saratoga, and that which I saw a while ago at Lebanon Springs) is less like tbe art of Gainsborough and of Reynolds tban that of Guido and of Grense. Much Flemish blood is in it. The skin is fairer, the eye bluer, the expression bolder, than they are in the English type, New York beauty bas more dasb and color, Boston beauty more sparkle and delicacy. Some men would prefer tbe more open and audacious loveliness of New York, with tbe Reubens-like rosiness and fullness of tbe flesh; but an Englisb eye will find more charm in the soft and shy expression of the elder type. In New York the living is more splendid, the dressing more costly, the furnisbing more lavish, than in New England; but the effect of tbis magnificence, as an educating agent, is found to be rather upon the eye than upon the soul. I speak of the real ladies of New York, women who would be accounted ladies in Hyde Park, when I say that, as a rule, they have a style and bearing, a dasb, a frankness, a confidence not to be seen among their sisters of either New England or Old England. "I was very bad upon him, but I got over it in time, and tben let him off," said a young and pretty woman of New York to a friend of mine, speaking of ber love affairs in tbe secrecy of a friendship which had lasted two long days. By him she meant a swain who she, in the wisdom of sixteen snmmers, had chosen from the crowd; one whom, if the wbim had only held her a trifle longer, she might have made her husband by lawful rites. Tbe girl was not a brazen minx, such as a man may sometimes see in a train, in a river boat, playing with big words, and putting on saucy airs, but a sweet and elegant girl, a lady from brow to instep, with a fine carriage, a low voice, a cultured mind, a piece of feminine grace, such as a man would like to have in a sister and strive to compass in a wife. Her oddity consisted, first, in the thing which she said; next, in her choice of words; in eitber phrase it lay in the difference between an English girl's habits of thought with regard to the relations of men and women. "I was bad upon him, bnt I let him off," expresses, in very plain Saxon words; an idea which would hardly have entered iuto an English girl's mind, and, even if it had so entered, would never have found that dry and passionless escape from her lips. In that phrase lay hidden, like a pass-word in a common saying, the cardinal secrets of American life—the scarcity of women in the matrimonial market, and the power of choosing and rejectieg which tbat scarcity confers on a young and pretty girl.

Every man bas a paradise around him, until he sins, and tbe angel of an accusing conscience drives him from his Eden.

Men look at the faults of others witb a telescope—at their own with tbe same instrnment reversed, or not at all.

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

CULTURE AND REFORM.

PRACTICAL men, or those who are fond of claiming to be pre-eminently such, are prone to sneer at the claims of high culture, regarding it as something having no solid value, and of no actual use in the business of life. The successful merchant, who has risen to wealth and influence without it, despises it as something fanciful and vain, because he does not see that it could have helped him in his career. The politician does not feel the need of its fine edged weapons on the stump, in conventions and primaries, or in forensic conflict, where the vulgar arts of popular oratory serve him better than would the scholarly eloquence of Burke or Macaulay. Even the earnest reformer, and the practical philanthropist, are prone to undervalue it as something feeble, effeminate, and of little use promoting the welfare of mankind. The difficulty experienced by the advocates of culture, in replying to these objections is well indicated by a writer in the New York Independent, who says that they make no reply to some of them, "not perceiving how any reply they could make would meet the intelligence that urges the query." Alluding to Matthew Arnold's "Plea for Culture," from which we have heretofore published some extracts in our "Gleanings," the same writer says:

"The masters and advocates of culture in this country have engaged in no open warfare against the 'Philistines' who speak of it with scorn and descried the praise of it as a very mandlin and miserable sort of cant. But in England there is a man who puts on armor, and wields a trenchant weapon with great effect, in defense of 'Sweetness and Light,' which in his view are the regenerating elements, in the intellectual and social world. Matthew Arnold is his name. He is the evangelist and the hero of the new gospel of Wisdom and Beauty. He and his comrades on either side of the water believe with all their hearts that the world needs most of all, now as ever, is the mental and spiritual refinement of individual men and women, under the influence of literature and thought. They are the enemies of all passion and all prejudice. They detest narrowness, however called. They abominate sectarianism, liberal or illiberal. They fight against every limitation that is not justified by reason. Liberals they are, but liberals tempered by experience, reflection, and renouncement. They are haters of hatred, scorners of scorn, and lovers of love. Ambitious of power, rank, wealth, they are not. They rather desire to keep aloof from organizations that commonly end in disorganizing men, and prefer to have nothing to do with machinery that grinds the inventors and the workers of it into dust. Their reliance is on mind, not on metals; on ideas, not on tactics; on growth, enlargement, expansion, not on watchwords, dogmas, conventions, or party leaders. In their judgement, men have tried to fight fire with fire, and darkness with darkness, long enough. The devil is master of his own weapons. The enemy of all ugliness is beauty; the foe of all darkness is light. Of these men it is noticeable that their notion of culture is worthy of the duty they call on it to perform. There is no affectation of delicacy about them. Their appeal is made in behalf of a very noble style of manliness, and a very admirable stamp of character. They know as well as any that mere education—scientific knowledge, book-learning, classical pedantry, and dainty critical taste—have no power to make men wiser or better. When they say culture, they mean training of the human creature with a view to the perfection of all his powers, and the attainment of the utmost degree of happiness and use. It has its origin in the love of perfection. It moves by the force not merely or primarily of the scientific passion for pure knowledge, but also of the moral and social passion for doing good. It takes as its motto the words of Bishop Wilson—'To make reason and the love of God prevail.'

"It is this element of culture, well understood, that makes the politician something more than a trader in votes; the merchant something more than a haggler for money; the architect something more than an artisan; the banker something more than a stock-jobber; the lawyer more than a trickster; and the divine something more than a pulpit speaker, or an ecclesiastical wire-puller. The introduction of even a little more sweetness and a little more light into journalism, politics, ethics, reform, religion, would have the effect to modify considerably the hardness and vulgarity of the average feeling on all these matters, and would contribute a great deal to the abatement of the animosities and jealousies that now, more than ignorance or stupidity, render individual and social progress difficult. Let the apostles of culture stand by their noblest definitions, and live up to the standard of their finest pruposes; let them preserve fresh their human sympathies, and keep vigorous their passion for diffusing the best ideas of their time, divesting them of all that is harsh, uncouth, difficult, abstract, professional, exclusive; let them try to humanize knowledge as well as to refine it; especially, let them, as they feel the need of doing, and declare their wish to do, let them give a tone of moral conviction and earnestness to the work they undertake, and they will have nothing to fear from the tribe of cavilers that snap at their heels. Let beauty be beautiful, and light be light; ugliness and the dark will confess the power in time. But Mr. Arnold must beware of his narrowness too. When he says 'The Pilgrim Fathers and their standard of perfection are rightly judged when we figure to ourselves Shakspeare or Virgil—souls in whom sweetness and light, and all that in human nature is most humane, were eminent—accompanying them on their voyage, and think what intolerable company Shakspeare and Virgil would have found them;' he forgets for a moment that the Pilgrim Fathers were supreme in one quality of which Virgil and Shakspeare, so far as we know them, had no considerable share, with which their sympathy was exceedingly slow, and for which their respect was in the smallest estimable measure. That quality was moral earnestness, devotion to great spiritual ends, power of self-sacrifice in behalf of ideal convictions—a precious quality which we cannot yet afford to lose or disparage; the loss and disparagement of which have cost Virgil and Shakspeare something. No doubt the Latin poet and the English dramatist would have found the Puritans, even the best of them, intolerable company on a sea-voyage, and anywhere else. What sort of company would the heroes and heroines of the May Flower have found the poet and the dramatist? And which would have the best right to be dissatisfied with the other on the ground of the qualities that elevate human nature in the moral scale?"

The concluding portion of the extract has a somewhat suspicious flavor of that apologetic sort of piety that is afraid of running to an extreme, either in the direction of liberality or bigotry, and is therefor incessantly disclaiming one or the other. In short, it sounds rather Tiltonish.

A LOST CIVILIZATION.

Last March, Professor George J. Adler delivered a lecture in the Chapel of the New York University on The Poetry of the Arabs of Spain, which contained a great deal of curious and interesting information concerning the literature, art, educational institutions and the general civilization of the Moors in Andalusia, prior to their expulsion by the Christians. A recent number of the Round Table furnishes an outline of the lecture, together with some of the more striking facts and statements which it contained. Looking at the Moors of Spain in the light of these facts and statements, and accepting Professor Adler as reliable authority, we are led to suspect that the prejudices of race and creed have in a great measure warped our judgment of this remarkable people, and caused us to regrad them with an unintelligent and unfounded feeling of superiority. In refinement, and in all the arts of civilization, they were certainly far superior to their conquerors. For this declaration however, the readers of Irwing, Ticknor, and Southey, than for the statement that in the principal Moorish cities better provision was made for the education of the people than has been made in San Francisco, and that learning and culture were held in higher esteem among the Arabs of Spain, than they are to-day in the United States. Yet the individual who should venture to advance these rather startling propositions, would not be destitute of facts which would go a great way in enabling him to maintain them.

THEIR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES.

Says Professor Adler:

"While in the rest of Europe scarcely any one except the clergy knew how to read and write, Andalusia, and, in fact, the whole of Moorish Spain, had schools without number in which the art was generally taught, and Hakem gave his capital alone twenty-seven for the special purpose of educating the children of the poorer classes free of expense. Nor was there any lack of institutions of a higher grade; there were numerous academies, generally attached to the mosques, at Cordova, Seville, Toledo, Valencia, Almeria, Malaga, and Jaen, at which the superior disciplines were taught, such as the interpretation of the Koran, philology, the mathematics, astronomy, medicine, jurisprudence, and philosophy, and the halls of which attracted both hearers and professors from all parts of the Mahommedan, and after awhile also from the Christian, world. So general was the taste and even the zeal for studies, that these Spanish institutions were frequented by students from the remotest parts of Asia and the heart of Germany; the Andalusians on their part would frequently not shun the hardships of the long journey to the East to quench their thirst for knowledge in the lecture-room of some distinguished master at Tunis, Cairman, Cairo, Damascus, Bagdad, Mecca, Basora, or Cufa, and there are instances on record in which learned pilgrimages extended as far as India and China, and into the very heart of Africa."

THEIR LIBRARIES.

This enlightened Sovereign also made ample provision for the intellectual wants of students and scholars of a more advanced grade than those who attended the academies and colleges:

"Not content with the mere viva vox of knowledge, Hakem was determined to possess it in a more permanent form; he founded a library for which his agents were commissioned to make collections in every part of the world, until the number of its volumes for which he had made room in his palace at Cordova had risen to the enormous figure of four hundred thousand. And all the books of this immmense collection, it is asserted, were read or consulted by the caliph himself, and many of them enriched with marginal notes from his own hand. The personnel of this library included a number of the most skilful copyists and binders, who occupied themselves constantly with the multiplication or the restoration of the precious manuscripts. Hakem's court thus soon became the natural resort for all the genius of the nation, and his liberality toward men of letters is said to have known no bounds. The intellectual life developed under the benign auspices of this prince was, therefore, naturally and in every respect a most brilliant one, and there is no example like it anywhere in the middle age."

This magnificent library, larger than any in America, shared the fate of the great collection at Alexandria. It was destroyed by the Berbers on the captnre of Cordova, in 1013. But this disaster did not exert any permauent influence, and so great was the zeal for learning among the Spanish Moslems, that it was soon repaired. In the thirteenth century the different cities of Andalusia contained no less than seventy libraries open to the public. Commenting npon this fact, the Round Table says: "Are there so many at this day of the 19th century in the United States? We have one in New York city."

POETRY AND WOMEN.

Profeesor Adler thinks that poetry was "the center and the soul of this astonishing developement of intellectual life; and was cultivated as well by the peasant behind his plough as by the prince in his palace, by cavalier and caliph alike. Even the women of the harem devoted themselves to this pnrsuit with not less ardor, and frequently with not less success, than the men."

He further tells us: "The position of woman in the society of Moslem Spain seems to have been a freer one than elsewhere among the Mahommedans, and she was permitted to be a sharer of the whole intellectual culture of her time. Hence we find quite a number of those who either won distinction in the sciences or vied with the men in the art of making poetry. This superiority of education gave rise to a degree and kind of respect such as the East scarcely knew, where the sentiment of love, for example, was almost exclnsively based on merely physical charms, and the relations between the sexes thns became a much snperior one. Talent and knowledge were regarded as attractions in no respect inferior to those of personal beauty, and it was not unfreqnently the case that a common taste for music or poetry constitnted an intimate bond of union between two hearts. We need not therefore be snrprised when, in the armatory poetry of the Spanish Arabs, we occasionally meet with an intensity of feeling, a mixtnre of impetnous passion and of tender melancholy snch as onr middle age scarcely can prodnce an instance of, and which is much closer allied to the sentimentality of modern times."

A SONNET.

How well Matthew Arnold understands poetry may be gathered by the following sonnet, extracted from his "New Poems:"

THAT son of Italy who tried to blow,
Ere Dante came, the trump of sacred song,
In his light youth amid a festal throng
Sate with his bride to see a public show.
Fair was the bride, and on her front did glow
Youth like a star; and what to youth belong,
Gay raiment, sparkling gauds, elation strong.
A prop gave way! crash fell a platform! lo,
'Mid struggling sufferers, hurt to death, she lay!
Shuddering they drew her garments off—and found
A robe of sackcloth next the smooth, white skin.
Such, poets, is your bride the Muse! young, gay,
Radiant, adorned outside; a hidden ground
Of thought and of austerity within.

DICKENS' tour in the United States will occupy about seven months. His avowed object in coming here is not for curiosity, nor to add to his reputation, but to make money. The charge for admission to his readings will be high—more than is usually charged in this country for a similar entertainment. At his readings in London the prices of tickets vary from two shillings to five shillings. The highest priced seats are in front, and require of their occupants the formality of a dress-coat and white gloves, a style of dress that the reader also adopts. A foreign correspondent of the Tribune describes Mr. Dickens' appearance in the rostrum, saying: "When you come to hear Mr. Dickens read, you will probably hear the most perfect drawing-room artist in the world. His voice has remarkable flexibility and sweetness, and the same may be said of his face, which is capable of every expression, with dignity in them all. He would have made a high comedian of the first rank. The 'Christmas Carol' is probably his best selection, as it affords him a broader play of character, and he has adapted it to an hour's entertainment so well that it tells the whole story. He will not be a disappointment either in person or in art. His body is in full robustness, and he is cheerful, handsome, and conscientious es ever."

A WONDERFUL LAKE.—The great Sunken Lake situated in the Cascade Mountains, is about 75 miles northeast from Jacksonville, Oregon. This lake rivals the famous valley of Sinbad the Sailor. It is thought to average 2,000 feet down to the water all round. The walls almost perpendicular, running down into the water, and leaving no beach. The depth of the water is unknown; its surface is smooth and unruffled, and it lies so far below the surface of the mountain that the air currents do not affect it. Its length is estimated at 12 miles, and its breadth at 10. No living man has, and probably never will, be able to reach the water's edge. It lies silent, still and mysterions in the bosom of the "everlasting hills," like a huge well, scooped out by the giant genii of the mountain in unknown ages gone by, and around the forest watch and ward are keeping. A late visiting party fired a rifle several times into the water at an angle of 45 degress, and were able to denote several seconds of time from the report of the gun until the ball struck the water.

THE prosperous man, who yields himself up to temptation, bids farewell to wellfare.

PEACE.—Since the war has ceased, tobacco has come down in price. B. C. Horn & Co. has the best tobacco ever manufactured. The store of B. C. Horn & Co., at the corner of Clay and Front streets, is well known. The fine-cut tobacco, in glass boxes, offered by this firm, surpasses everything ever imported by them before.

A HORSE SPECULATION.

BY JOHN QUILL.

I BOUGHT him off Johnson, the horse doctor, and he said he was dammed by Flora Temple, sired by Black Hawk, and desired by all the horse jockeys in the State. I wish they had got him.

He was fourteen and a half hands high and one finger over, his color was dnn, and his purchaser was about in that condition also.

He was slightly sprung in the knees, and his tail had once been cut, so that it stood right on end, and looked more like a bunch of straw nailed on to the end of a log than anything else.

But he was rather a fine looking horse, and the man warranted him kind.

Bnt it was a poor kind I afterward found.

He said he conld make his mile inside of 2:35 without an effort. It was two hours and thirty-five minutes he meant, unless he intended to deceive me. But he could make a mile inside of that time if he exerted himself and didn't get one of his fits on him.

He was a peculiar horse, and was subject to a variety of complaints that wonld have killed any ordinary animal; but he seemed to stand them well enough.

The first night I had him, I put him in the stable and gave him a feed. The next morning my wife remarked that she didn't sleep a particle on account of some locomotive or other out on the railroad, that was pulling and blowing all night trying to make headway. I heard it too, and it struck me queer that the engine couldn't get past that place.

I went ont too see about it. It wasn't a locomotive, it was my horse. He was breathing and sighing unlike any other horse I ever heard before, and I was alarmed about him. I was afraid he would blow the whole end of the stable out. I unhitched him and took him around to Johnson.

Johnson seemed surprised, but said he only had a slight attack of the heaves. "All hosses most has it. It'll pass off," said he; so I drove him home and created an impression in the town that the wind was freshening up for a hurricane.

About half way up the main street he came to a dead halt; I clicked my tongue for him to go on. He never budged. I touched him with the whip. He began backing, and backed the buggy right upon the pavement and through a plate glass window, worth two hundred dollars.

Then he started down the street like lightning and run over two boys, breaking their legs, and crippling them for life. I won't mention the expense I was put to. You wouldn't believe me if I was to give the figures.

I was so busy attending court for two weeks that I hadn't a chance to use him; at the end of that time his lower jaw had swelled up until you couldn't tell whether he hadn't got his head on up side down or not. So I drove him over to Johnson to see what was the matter with him.

Johnson seemed to feel hurt that the animal should behave so. But he said it was only a little touch of the glanders. "It don't hurt a hoss to have 'em now and then, it does 'em good, but it'll pass off," said Johnson.

So I was more hopeful, and drove home again without any serious accident, except that the horse shied at a chicken in the road and took a wheel off by running the buggy into the fence. Still I didn't blame him much, for Mr. Johnson told me that "it was good for a hoss to be timid; it's a sign of pure blood."

The glanders didn't affect his appetito any. He ate more oats and hay than wonld have run an ordinary livery stable, and not satisfied with that he chewed the feed-box all np, and tried to gnaw down a yellow pine partition.

Johnson said it was a "good thing for a hoss to be a hearty feeder."

I never owned a horse before, and I was a little set up about it. So I thought I would drive my wife and family in town to church the following Snnday. He went along all right until he came in front of Furguson's house. Mr. Furguson is jealous of my having a horse, and our girls don't speak to the Furguson girls, because they said we were "stuck up" about our horse.

When this animal arrived there he snddenly began to stagger from side to side and bolt aronnd like a drunken man, pntting his head into tree boxes and one thing another like some old ram. At last he fell over the bank at the side of the road, turned three or four somersanlts, dragged the carriage after him, and then lay stretched ont there apparently as dead as any dummy.

The women had on their best clothes, and they were completely spoiled, while Angnsta sprained her wrist so that she conldn't do a stitch of work for a month. And the whole Furguson family stood at the window and smiled.

I walked two miles to get Johnson to come and look at the horse. He came along and appeared as if he was provoked at the horse for his conduct. Then he stooped down and stuck a knife in his neck and let out a barrel or two of blood, and the horse gradually got better. "It's nothing but a slight attack of blind staggers," said Mr. Johnson. "Every hoss has got to have it. It's just like measles in children. It'll pass off, and he'll be better for it."

We got him home by easy stages to the stable, and there he staid for three weeks, until he seemed better, except that he still had a touch of the heaves and the diste mper.

Shortly afterward I had to drive over to Delaware City to see a man, and I gave Mr. Johnson ten dollars to go with me, in case the horse came to pieces on the road, or anything of a serious nature happened.

We started at daybreak, and had progressed about a mile and a half by dinner time, when the horse suddenly stopped short, and wouldn't budge an inch.

I suggested that perhaps the barbed steed had forgotten something and wanted to go back. Mr. Johnson said, "No, it was only one of his little tricks. Most every horse had some eccentricity or other. Just let him alone for a minute, and he'll get over it."

We waited three-quarters of an hour. Then Johnson got out and undertook to pat him on the neck, and the horse got frightened and kicked until he got one leg through the dasher and couldn't get it out.

I asked Mr. Johnson what he thonght we had better do now. He said "It was all right. All really good horses kicked. He wouldn't give a cent for an animal that hadn't pluck enough to kick. It was a sign that he felt his oats."

So we loosened his leg and got in, and before we had time to pick up the lines he gave a jerk and started down the road at lightning speed—lightning for him, that is—say four miles an hour, and ran the buggy into a ditch, and then tried to jump over a fence, but failed miserably, and got another blind stagger on him and laid there until nine o'clock that night.

I didn't get to see that man at Delaware City, and, in fact, haven't seen him yet. Johnson said it was a good thing any how, for they had the fever down there, and I ought to consider it a Providential thing that the horse was taken just as he was. If we had gone to Delaware City we might both have been dead men.

It is singular how Johnson always looks on the bright side of things when that horse is concerned.

Then I thought that perhaps after all I had better sell the horse, he was so much trouble, so I advertised him. The man who came to buy him was not as hopeful as Johnson. He said that the horse was spavined, foundered and distempered. He had the glanders, and heaves, and blind staggers, and bots and ring-bone. and a number of other infirmities, that I don't care to mention. He said the horse was too hard in the mouth, too.

"And I don't like to pnll too hard on a horse, you know," said he, "for I know a man who split a horse in half jerking at him."

So I told this man I wasn't much at driving a bargain, but still if he would take the horse off of my hands for any reasonable sum, he might bave him. He said he wouldn't assume the risk of driving him for less than ten dollars. So I gave him that sum, and he took him away. But he hadn't gone more than half a mile before the horse got another blind stagger on him, and laid down and gasped, stretched his legs out, and then died, and broke for horse heaven for all I know.

Mr. Johnson was called in, but he couldn't do anything for him. He only said he considered it a good thing, "for the horse, you know, must have suffered a good deal, and now he's out of his misery, and as you're a kind-hearted man, Quill, you ought to be glad." So I was, but I didn't feel exultant when Johnson handed in a bill of one hundred dollars for professional services. It didn't seem fair. But I never had any luck with horses, any how, and I don't care to speculate again.

A LIVELY PLACE.—The people of Java have rather a lively time of it. According to the last official statistics contained in the Vijdschrift vor Nederlandsch Java, the tiger has in one single year consumed exactly one hundred and forty-eight human beings, and in another year one hundred and thirty-one. The crocodiles cleared an averge of fifty people a year, while serpents acconnted for between twenty-two and forty-three. Bnt the Dutch seem to accept their fate with characteristic equanimity. The Governor General a long while ago offered as a prize for every tiger that was killed the mnnificent snm of twenty-two guilders ($10.) His snbjects apparently prefer being eaten by the tiger.

THE PARIS EXHIBITION BUILDING.—The Nord says the Exhibition building will not be pulled down as soon as the Exhibition is over, but will be used for an international bazaar, in which the productions of all parts of the world will be offered for sale. A canal is to be made between the Seine and the Champ de Mars, so as to place the building in direct communication with the river.

A MR. FRANK NOYES, leading man of the Omaha Academy of Music, was recently shot through the hip in a street fight in that border city. We suppose it is called the Academy of Music, on account of the singing of the freqnent bullet. Wonder if the theatrical agents are not a little troubled to find talent for Omaha?

CHARLES DICKENS AS A READER.

A writer in the New York Independent gives a sketch of Charles Dickens as a reader. The correspondent says:—"The minute he began to read the famous Pickwick Trial I found Dickens, and heartily enjoyed every word. Here he seemed at home, and his audience also; for this, in spite of age, still has the inimitable drollery and spirit of his early works. How people laughed! English merriment is as sonorous as English speech, and the roars that shook the walls spoke well for the health of aristocratic lungs. Old gentlemen mopped their faces; stout dowagers leaned back exhausted; dandies dropped their glasses to wipe tears of genuine laughter from their eyes; belles, forgetting their flushed faces, laughed like girls; and every one looked about him with an expression of hilarious good will, which was impossible to resist. My companion grew hysterical in vain efforts to restrain his shouts; and I soon became entirely reckless of my personal appearance, bent only upon enjoyiug myself to the ntmost. Buzfuz was au exact copy of an Euglish attorney, and Dickens has made it a study. Justice Stareleigh was as much like an owl as human being could be. Winkle—poor, bashful soul—got into a pet, and stuttered in a way that must have convulsed the court, as it did us. Mrs. Cluppins was not so well done as I have seen it on a private stage in America; and Sam Weller was not spirited enough. But Old Weller's gruff, wheezy 'woice,' spectrally roaring, 'Spell it with a We,' was a thing to shout over long afterward. Dickens never laughed himself, and when a perfect gale of merriment blew through the hall, he stood looking at his audience with a droll twinkle in his eye, and the benign expression of one who sincerely enjoyed seeing his fellow creatures happy. The moment he was done he made a hasty bow, put the book under his arm, and walked briskly away; and I fouud myself wondering, whether he would finish the evening 'declining and polling' with Mr. Boffin, or drop in to supper with that human Phœnix, Wilkins Micawber."

IT is more reputable to wear a borrowed coat than a coat paid for with borrowed money.

BELDEN'S RESTAURANT.—Mr. F C. Belden, so well known as the proprietor of the depot of family luxuries, at No. 652 Sacramento street, has entered in the business of entering for bachelors. as well as families, nnd has opened a first-class restaurant on the corner of Spring and Summer streets, opposite the California Market, where he is prepared to supply all the wants of "good livers," in his peculiar superior style. The choice articles contained in his depot of family luxuries—which can be found gracefully enumerated in rhyme in our advertising columns—will be largely drawn on to give peculiar zest to Belden's Restaurant fare.

OYSTERS AND CLAMS.—Wm. Roalfe, Nos. 40, 41, and 42, California Market, entrance on California street, keeps on hand, from 6 A. M. until 5 P. M., and Saturday nights until 10 P. M., oysters and clams. Families supplied at the shortest notice with fresh oysters and clams. The deviled-crabs are to be had here and nowhere else. And for busiuess men, on California street, there is no place where a better lunch can be served. Mr. Roalfe is well known to the community as a first-class caterer. Call and leave your orders, wholesale or retail.

ST. CHARLES RESTAURANT.—This new restaurant is presided over by Mme. Cazintre, being connected with the hotel of C. Gnillaud, Nos. 507 nnd 509 Pine street, just above Kearny. The result of several visits there, demonstrated the fact, that ladies predominate, and shonld some of our beanx and bachelors decide to make it a "stopping place," we gnarentee a "feast of beauty"—to say nothing of the excellent meals served a la Francisco.

SORBIER'S RESTAURANT.—Sorbier, formally of the International, Merchant street, and lately of the Occidental Restaurant, Washington street, has opened at No. 607 Sacramento street, where he will be pleased to see his old patrons and the public. Sorbier's reputation is well known in this commnnity as a superior caterer, and no expense will be spared at his new place to sustain his good name with the public.

THE CAPITOL SALOON.—This well-known saloon has changed hands, and is now under the management of the Buckman Bros. The Capitol Saloon has long been celebrated for the excellence of ite wines and liquors, and Bnckman Bros. will allow no falling off in the quality of the article dispensed to the public. The Capitol is opposite the Russ House, No. 226 Montgomery street.

PETER JOB'S RESTAURANT—To the San Franciscan, this house, at the corner of Bush and Montgomery street, is "as familiar as household words," and is noted for its good fare, cleanliness and gentility. Ladies and gentlemen can find no more suitable place for enjoying the delicacies of the season, than at Peter Job's.

A GOOD FIT is a most desirable thing in a garment, and Mr. Peter Short, merchant tailor, at No. 613 Washington street, by his success in pleasing his numerous patrons, has won an enviable reputation in his profession as a fitter. His taste and work will please the most fastidious, who may want good fitting and becoming garments.

GRAND MASK BALL.—This (Saturday) evening a Grand Mask Ball will he given at No. 335 Pine street, between Montgomery and Sansome. From outside talk, this ball will be the grandest affair of ite kind ever given in San Francisco. Parties who have not secured their tickets can do so at the door.

CARPETS, Upholstery Goods, Wall Paper, etc., may be bought at the lowest figure at the new store of Joseph Fredericks, 123 Kearny, between Sutter and Post streets. Mr. Fredericks' stock is entirely fresh new, and bought at the present ruling reduction of prices.

STEAM BATHS FOR ONE DOLLAR, at Dr. Bourne's, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Notice is renewed that this is the only establishment which excludes all loathsome diseases and improper persons.

THE FAIRY PRINCE.

BY WALTER THORNBURY.

I saw her face shine through the pane
(That dripped with beads of rain and glistened,)
Just as above the Marble Arch
A rainbow sprang: I stood and listened

To a drenched man who played the flute;
A tune of joy, but dashed with sadness.
Dead leaves were blowing round the park,
Yet that sweet face was full of gladness.

I knew that look so beaming, pure,
(I've seen it very often since;)
O Love's beguiler, faithless Hope!
She waited for a Fairy Prince.

That Fairy Prince, with royal brow,
So strong to slay misfortune's brood;
So swift to rescue maidens fair,
So full of power to aid the good:

Resistless, wise, with voice so clear,
'Twould make the envious sirens pine;
With eyes all luminous with love,
A love eternal and divine.

I waited till night brought the stars,
And then I saw that saddened face
Move slowly from the window there,
And darkness gather o'er the place.

How many maidens wait like her,
(I've seen such faces often since,)
On Summer morns and Autumn eves,
Still waiting for their Fairy Prince.

OLD STORIES RE-TOLD.

THE WRECK OF THE ROTHSAY CASTLE STEAM-PACKET.

At ten o'clock on the morning of the 17th of August, 1831, the Rothsay Castle steamer, running between Liverpool and Beaumaris and Bangor, was getting up steam in the Mersey. The sea had been very rough the night before, so much so that an American ship towed into the offing at daybreak had prudently returned to her former anchorage. But the wind went down as the day advanced, and though there was a heavy ground-swell, there was nothing else to alarm or delay the reckless captain of the steamer, who had one hundred and fifty sailors, engineers and passengers in his care. Ten o'clock was the proper time of starting, but the passengers were tardy, and at eleven a Mr. Foster arrived with his wife, servant, and carriage. This gentleman had resolved not to go by the packet, but finding the steamer not yet started when he reached the shore, he changed his mind, and at once embarked. At nearly half-past eleven the steamer was still hanging about for dilatory passengers, but a Mr. Leigh, of Liverpool, then threatening to report the captain for his unpunctuality, he at last sullenly yielded. He moved his hand, the engines heaved and rocked, and then the band, mechanicaly gay, began playing "Cheer up, cheer up."

The shore bell rang in petulant haste. There was much kissing and pressing of hands, and the plank was drawn in.

Soon the shores receded, and the fluttering handkerchiefs and the waving hands grew too small to be distinguished. As the forts were passed, the sailors began to get the steamer ship-shape, coiled away ropes, got out the sail, arranged the benches, and lowered the trunks and boxes into the hold.

The passengers were of all classes—Welsh clergymen, many ladies, London solicitors and men of business, Liverpool merchants, persons from Bury, Cheadle, and Rochdale; some Manchester tradesmen, a Birmingham Quaker, an American traveler, a Portugnese who had been secretary to Canning when he was English ambassador at Lisbon, and a land-agent of the Earl of Derby. The overworked business men were for the pleasure of the fresh, vigorous, and highly vitalised sea air, and the glimpses of Welsh headlands, Welsh sands, Welsh bays and Welsh mountains.

On rounding the Black Rock, five miles from Liverpool, the head wind settled into a strong and swelling gale. In the broader water, the steamer seemed to labor heavily, and to quiver like a frightened horse, every time a sea'struck her full. Gradually, as the passengers grew sick and staggered to their cabins, a gloom fell over the vessel, and many began to listen with a sort of awe to the louder pulse of the engines, and the more angry wash of the waves, as the steamer reeled and struggled on, in a scared, confused sort of way, past the Floating Light, fifteen miles from the great Lancashire city. Dinner was served up in the cabin at three o'clock. The captain lingered long at dinner, and drank more than a good officer with a dangerous and uncertain night before him should have done. Frightened women began to ask anxiously, "When shall we reach Beaumaris?" Pale fathers and husbands only shook their heads and looked anxiously to windward.

Mr. Tarrey, a land-agent, called down the cabin stairs:

"Captain, there seems to be a great deal of danger. I wish you would turn back."

Atkinson shouted back, "There's a deal of fear but no danger. It's folly to go back; you'll only have the same ground to go over again."

The gentlemen in the cabin, good sailors who were able to enjoy their meal, laughed with the surly captain at the frightened landsmen on deck. He then complimented two pretty girls who had remained in the cabin on their seamanship. By this time the mate had also taken more than his share of grog, and as two of the steamer crew had been left at Bangor on the last voyage, there were only two flushed men left to work the crazy vessel. A second request was then made by those on deck, who saw what little way the steamer made, to put back to Liverpool while power still remained to do so.

The dogged captain, heedless of danger, replied mildly, "If we were to turn back with passengers, it would never do; we should have no profit."

On the confused vessel went, making very little way, her single engine beating feebly against a heavy and growing sea, much too near the land prudently to weather that great promontory of Denbighshire, the Great Ormshead. She should have been steered for the Menai Straits, with the wind fairly on her beam, her sails set in aid of the flagging steam.

A little after five, when the captain, heated and testy, returned on deck after two hours over his wine, a cluster of passengers came round him, and entreated him to return, all offering their fare, and others promising a gratuity in money. To one passenger he said, tauntingly, "One would think you had committed murder, you are so frightened. I'm not one that turns back. If you knew me, you would not ask such a thing."

The sea was now forcing its way through the axles of the paddles, the engine fires were partly extinguished, and thus the steam power was reduced just when it was most needed. The cabin floors were also under water; the smeared and black-faced firemen were discussing the vessel in rather an ominous way; one said she was sixteen years old, and originally no better than a tea-chest. Old sailors had always prophesied she'd be the grave of some of them some day. Passengers are easily scared, but sailors' fears are presages.

Between six and seven the ebb tide made, and this, it was hoped, would help them on; but the vessel was more helpless than ever, going scarcely more than two miles an hour. The seams gaped wider, the engine fires grew duller as heavy seas poured down from the deck into the engine-room. The captain was down below, making evasive and contradictory answers.

"It's only the tail of a storm gone by, and there's no danger."

But at last came the confession so terrible to frightened passengers:

"I wish I could get somewhere to ride out the storm!"

All this time the lee shore was looming near. Driven landward by the waves, the Rothsay Castle had been these dreadful hours working painfully from the Hoyle sands at the mouth of the Dee, parallel to every bay and bight, till, about eight o'clock, she arrived off the Little Ormshead. From thence past the Great Ormshead (only four miles) took the wretched cranky vessel two hours; and the leakage increased as night came on. The passage from Liverpool to Beaumaris is only fifty miles, and is generally done in six or seven hours; but this steamer was eleven hours accomplishing thirty-six miles. The hold was now so full of water that it ran over into the cabin. The passengers began to work at the pumps in gangs, but the majority had given up all hope; for the leaks gained fast upon them, and the captain thought it dangerous to put into Conway, and had refused to push on to Penmaen, to anchor there sheltered by the Anglesea coast. The sky was at that time wild and cloudy, and through the driven clouds the moon seemed to race, often obscured and sometimes lost; and through the sickly light, the precipice of the Great Ormshead was seen throwing its mighty shadow, blackening the mountainous waves.

The danger increased—yes it was upon them now. The coals were drenched, and every time the furnace doors were opened the sea rushed in and dulled the fires. Eleven o'clock came, and the leaks were fast increasing. Nothing could now compose the women. The captain was in vain asked to hoist a lantern or fire a signal-gun; but he had neither gun nor lanturn, and he never thought of blazing a tarred rope from the poop to bring out the Welsh fishermen.

At about a quarter to twelve land duskily gloomed on the larboard bow, and the sinking moon showed it to be Puffin Island, half a mile from Anglesea, and at the entrance of the Menai Straits. A cry of joy greeted it from the deck, for it seemed an omen of safety. There was hope now; but two of the engine-room fires were extinguished. The pumps had become blocked with ashes from the furnaces, and were useless. A brave passenger called out for buckets to bale with, but the only bucket on board had just dropped overboard. The same energetic man proposed to bale with hats, but the expedient seemed inadequate, and no one joined him in it. Now was a crisis indeed. The tide had turned, the water was getting shallow; the place was dangerous at night without constant sounding. The captain should have used his sails, or have anchored and made signals of distress; but he remained down below.

There were shoals everywhere before the vessel; the spot was indeed the very Dardanells of the voyage, and required incessant care even for a good ship and by sunlight. Beaumaris Bay opened to the north: at the eastern entrance to it frowned the Great Ormshead, and on the west stretched the coast of Anglesea and the great rocks of Penmaenmawr. Ten miles of sea rolled between these gateways of the bay. To the north spread that vast graveyard of ships, the Lavan sands. The vessel's course lay up the straits leading past Beaumaris to Caernarvon and the Irish Sea. The north east point of the dreaded Lavan sands is named (from some wreck centuries) the Dutchman's Bank, between which an out-lying insular shoal called the Spit there is the Wash, a very narrow channel. In the open sea the Rothsay Castle was a mere bundle of driftwood; what would it be when surrounded by shoals, and picking its way down mere lanes of deep water, with death on either side?

A little past midnight the end began. The ship had dragged along the eastern edge of the Dutchman's Bank, and, in endeavoring to recover her course, jammed on the Spit sand, stern foremost. Five minutes before, the helmsman had grimly and silently touched Mr. Broadhurst, a passenger, on the shoulder, and pointed out breakers whitening a hundred yards to larboard.

The first shock was alarming, but was not violent—a mere grating thump. Few passengers were on deck. With the second concussion there came a heavy crash as if the vessel was breaking up bodily. Then came shrieks from the women, and all in the cabin, sick or well, rushed to the stairs and struggled to reach the deck. One of the passengers saw the nails of the ship's timbers partially drawn out by the shock, and at once decided that all was lost. A Liverpool branch pilot, unnoticed before, and who had been drinking with the steward and sleeping in some hole forward, now came among the passengers, and exclaimed:

"We are all lost!"

That drove the women to absolute frenzy. Some, however, still maintained that it was only the paddle-wheel which had broken, and all would soon be well. The captain gave violent, confused, and contradictory orders. He ordered the helm "hard a-starboard," which would have driven the vessel further into the sands. The man at the helm, however, seeing the danger, thought right to port the helm; but the captain sent the mate angrily, and he took the wheel and put it a-starboard, as if determined to lose the vessel at once. The gentlemen passengers were then ordered to go first forward and then aft, in order to try and float the vessel. The paddles were ordered to be reversed, but the steam was too low to work them. Those on deck who heard these proofs of the captain's ignorance of the long-existing danger now lost all hope. The vessel was fast filling. Some persons entreated the captain to let go the anchor, and keep the vessel from driving, as the sands would soon be covered with deep water, and assistance might then arrive. His answer was:

"Hold your bother; there's no danger."

Once more the vessel was washed off it, cleared the sand, but struck again. Then she dragged herself, like a wounded, delirious creature, a mile along the bank, rolling, pitching, and bumping, till she came within two hundred yards of the Swash Channel. There the doomed wreck beat again on the sand, and lay helpless, with no motion of her own, no struggle left in her, clogged by the fatal indraught, staked to the sand by the dead weight of the lifeless engine, and ready to pour out her hecatombs of victims to man's insatiable enemy, the sea. At that last death-blow every one rushed from below. Some of the ladies remained locked in each other's arms, some tore their dress or threw away their caps and bonnets, others swooned or dashed themselves on the deck in a delirious and passionate paroxysm of terror. Many were hugging their children in the agony of parting; husbands and wives were taking leave of each other, or avowing their determination to die together. The infatuated captain still had, or pretended to have, hope. He ordered the jib to be hoisted, to wear the vessel's head round towards the Swash. He cried out that there was no danger, it was only sand she was on; she would soon float again; she was all right; she was on her way to Beaumaris.

Mr. Foster was now asked, by request of the passengers, if he would allow his carriage to be thrown overboard; he at once consented; but while some property of value was being moved from it, the captain interfered, giving it as his opinion that the weight was rather beneficial than otherwise to the wreck. The captain was then asked to let the bell be rung to alarm Beaumaris. He said:

"If they wanted it rung, they might ring it themselves."

The bell was rung till the tongue was broken; then it was beaten with a piece of wood and with bits of coal. At this crisis a seaman deliberately took out the binnacle lamp and broke it into pieces on the deck. The captain, at last aroused, was trying the depth of the water alongside with a pole, and found it to be seven feet.

The wreck now dashed about in its death-gasp. The stays of the ponderous chimney had long ago given way, but had been secured again by the crew and passengers. They soon again yielded to the rocky strain, and the loosened tube swung to and fro, threatening to sweep away all in its fatal neighborhood. At last it fell, tearing away the maiamast, aad both struck across the poop and starboard quarter with hideous crashes that sounded like the roar of a saundered iccberg. The bulwarks oa the side of the fall were shattered into fragments. It is supposed the captaia and mate both perished at this time, as they were never seen again on deck. The passengers were now prayiug, aloae or ia groups. The crew were carefully watched to see what they would do, but they, too, were all but hopeless. Three lashed themselves to the top of the foremast, some stripped and prepared for swimming, others tried to collect materials for rafts. Two men got hold of a big drum, but there was a discussion about their iaequality of size. Both men perished, and the dram was afterwards seen, barst aad abandoned to the waves. Some of the passeagers, ia paroxysms of irresolation aad terror, moved restlessly from place to place. Mr. Tarrey, whose wife and five children were on board, at first agitated, had now grown calm, resolute, and resigned. He said:

"To return without my family would be worse than death. Yes, I will die with them."

The storm was now increasing, the moon had gone dowa, a solitary star in the black vault above aad the phosphoresceace of the turbulent sea were the only light. Many persoas cluag to the iron under the plank that passes from one paddle-box to aaother. The windlass and the belfry were also seized with avidity as points of resirtsace to the waves. Hughes, one of the seamen on the foremast, let go his child's haad when he began to climb, aud the boy, (a fine fellow of about twelve,) sobbed and shrieked, "Father, father, save me!" But ia vain; despair has ao heart. In the midst of all this horror, however, one poor woman, a carpenter's wife, seemed to entirely forget herself, and was absorbed ia her aaxiety for aa iufant at her breast.

There had beea a rush to the ship's boat, till a sailor called out that there were no oars, and that there was a hole in the bottom of it. The boat then broke away at one end, and hung by the other. The carpenter's wife, who still clung to it, was rescued by some of the passengers. This poor loving mother instantly begged a gentleman near her to wrap her shawl closer round her to prevent the water touching the child. Even when she sank a short time afterwards, she was seen holding the child up aoove the waves, careless of all but that.

While Mr. Selwyn and other passeagers were praying, some one exclaimed:

"There's a light oa Puffin Islaad!"

Everybody at once spraag to their feet and shouted; but whea no answer came but the impatient roar of the sea, some returned to their prayers, others wept, and maay agonized each other by mutual accusatioas as to who had prompted the fatal voyage.

And now came the climax of horror. The ship began to part, and the two trembling masts led oae way, the stern the other. A tremendous wave rolled and leaped over the vessel, striking and spliting and washing away to leeward. The frightened crowd clung together. There was a death-like sileace. Their heads almost touched the water. Their collective weight broke away railings and stanchions, benches and bulwarks, aad they all passed into the yawning sea. There was one deep-drawn sigh, oae spasmodic, choking, simultaneous gasp; they struggled and writhed ia a whirl-pool, and then sank.

A side plaak first yawned open, aad then the deck sank to the level of the sea. Another wave succeeded this. Mr. Tianie says he then found himself on the mast, with the steward, his wife, and, he thiaks, a child. The steward's wife was exhausted, aad her husbaad was tryiag to eacourage her Mr. Tinnie then left the mast, and swam to some other spars on which were two persons. He could see a raft in the distance with eight or aine persons on it. Stunned for a momeat by floating pieces of wreck, Mr. Tianie dived every time a drift approached, and cautioned his companions to do the same. Preseutly a vast mass rolled over him, aad when he again looked up he was alone. A little girl aamed Tarrey, whose family had already been drowned, was seea tossed about the quarter-deck, repeatedly dasbed agaiast the gunwale, and then sucked back by the waves to be again beaten and tossed. She kept crying piteously: "Oh! woa't you come to me, father? Oh, mamma!" till she was washed away.

A Mr. Nuttall, who also fell when the bulwark gave way, weary of suffering, reclined his head on the water, and waited to sink. At that moment the side of the packet came floating by, and he succeeded in getting on it and resting on his knees. While doing this, the little boy the seaman had forsaken caught hold of him, aad mounted ou his back with the incxorablo clutch of despair. Mr. Nuttall, unable to swim, heavily clad, and thus encumbered, did not abandon hope. By dint of a rope washed near him, he contrived to get the poop, and place the boy within reach of the wheel. Just then he heard a cry, and looking over the side of the wreck saw a woman clinging. She was trying to climb, but seemed about to fall back into the sea. He caught her by her hair, which was loosc to the wind. He then got a firmer hold, and dragged her up oa the poop. Another person theu drew her to the wheel, aad broke her bonnet strings, her bonnet beiug full of water aad aearly choking her. They thea rescued a Mr. Coxhead, who had been hanging for a quarter of an hour to some ropes at the stern, dashed against the vessel with every sea. They kept his head from the water which was knee-deep on the ratt; but he seemed to be dying. Every wave aow washed oae or more survivors from the poop. The platform oa which the wheel was soon sank into the water, fastened oaly by cordage, which the Liverpool pilot and six other survivors severed. They then floated clear. There were on this raft, oaly three square yards wide, a lady, four geatlemen, the pilot, and the sailor's soa.

While all this was passiag in the stern, there were terrible scenes also ia other parts of the vessel. A musician and aaother man clambered into the dickey of Mr. Forster's carriage. They were opposiug a third maa who had just got a seat, whea a wave swept the carriage into the sea. The last comer, a Mr. Hammond, got astride of a plank, which was, however, instantly seized by another drowaiag man. For half an hour these two men sileutly struggled for the plank, the saccess of the one always uaseated the other. The secoud maa at last grew worn-out, fainted, fell off the plauk, and was seen no more. Mr. Hammond thea resumed his seat, aad floated safely till day-break.

Mr. Lawreuce Duckworth has left a vivid picture of the horrors of that night. He and some fifty others still clung to the wreck, and before oae by one died and dropped away, his ear grew so familiar with the awful indications of death under such circumstances, that he kaew whea the fatal moment was approaching. "There was," he observes, a "hissing sound made by the lengthened gasps, which became more and more laborious, and ended in a short convulsiou. The body became quickly rigid and the clutch of the hands more unyielding thaa in life." An old man died first, and the waves took him off his feet. He had hold of the binnacle aad of Mr. Duckworth. This threatcned to involve Mr. Duckworth in the fate of the old mau, for the additional distress which such a burden oecasioned, was very severe; and it was not without great difficulty that he at length shook him off—or rather tore him away—for the portion of Mr. Duckworth's clothes, by which he held when living, was retaiaed in his lifeless grasp. Mr. Foster's servant was the next victim, aad Mr. Duckworth was reduced to the painful aecessity of using similar meaas to disencuaber himself of the body. The man above him, too, after a struggle of amazing duratioa, considering the ceaseless exertions which his tryiag situation required, died in the same horrible maaner as the unhappy beings just described; and, as with them his hauds retaiaed the grapple which had been strongly put forth in the paags of death, and it was some time before the waves tore him from the horror and danger of frequcat aad violent contact with the body.

Oae by one the survivors were taken away, till only Mr. Duckworth and the three sailors on the mast were left. Dreadiag the rising tide, Duckworth called to them to fliag him a rope that he might raise himself; but they refused, and in a few miautes an immense sea broke over the wreck, with a force which threatened at once to shatter it to atoms. Oa partially recoveriug from this terrible shock, Mr. Duckworth saw that the mast was gone. It had beea swept away to some distance from the wreck, to which, however it was attached by some ropes, aad the three mea were still fastened to the places they occupied when the spar was erect.

Twice only during the night Duckworth felt hopeless: first, when his wife was torn from him; then when the mast fell and left him alone. But the prevailing impressioa upon his mind during so maay hours of trial was, that he should eventually be saved, and this impression, it seems, which no doubt iastrumentally contributed to save him, had been made by a dream he had the night before he embarked in the Rothsay Castle. "This dream," says Mr. Duckworth, "which I thought nothing of when I arose from the slumber in which it was presented, occurred to me from time to time whilo I was upon the wreck; it forced itself upon my recollection when my compaaions were dropping oa every side of me into the sea:

> Methought the billows spoke, and told me of it;
> The winds did sing it to me.

It was with me when I was aloae—when I seemed, indeed, shut out from the living and engulfed by surrouading waters. I thought still of my dream, and gave it literal interpretatioa, believing it sent by Providencc to afford me a sustaining assuraacc of protection and a ultimate deliverance from peril."

Nearly half an hour after the foremast fell, Mr. Duckworth's heart leaped for joy too see a boat near Penmaen Point. His eyes were on it; she was steering for the Sound! No, thank God, it was for the wreck. Duckworth then shouted to the men on the mast to keep ap their spirits. It afterwards appeared that, a pilot on Peamaea Poiat had seea through his glass what he coasidered was a fishiag vessel, trolliag over the Dutchman's Bank, towards Conway Bay. It surprised him, however; he looked keeaer, and saw it was a mast with meu clinging to it. The mast fell five minutes later; had he looked those few minutes later, the four men would have been lost. Two other pilots then joined him, launched a boat, and bore down the two miles to the wreck. They were astonished at Duckworth's escape, aad with difficulty got him iato the boat; the three sailors were found in a kaot, with their arms laced for uaitedwarmth aud protection. Believing all the rest had perished, the boat steered for Beaumaris; near this place the pilot picked up Mr. Tinae iaseasible, but holding tightly to a spar.

In the meantime the poop deck raft was overcrowded, and there was a fear that it would siak. Mr. Coxhead had recovered coasciousaess in time to see eight or nine persoas drop oae after aaother from the mainmast, aad a Mr. Hammond was rescued and drawa upon the raft after some objectioas for fear of overcrowdiag. They then paddled the raft towards Coaway, and Miss Whitehead, almost naked as she was, leat her white petticoat for the double purpose of sail and sigaal. Two mea held up this, while four others worked at the paddles. The Penmaeu boat did aot see them, but they had hope now, for they could see the smoke of houses and discera people walking in the Cacrnavonshire fields. Presently a life boat pushed out of Beaumaris. Mr. Walker, a young collegian, had seen them through a telescope, from Beaumaris-green.

"Help the lady first," was the sailors' cry. They placed her ia the boat, wrapped in their jackets. Mr. Whitehead was nearly dead, so he was lifted in next. The first exclamation of one of the life-boat mea, when he heard the wreck was the wreck of the Rothsay Castle was:

"I knew this would be the end of her; I left her last week on that accouat."

The bodies as they were washed on shore, were placed in the Shire-hall, till they could be claimed and removed for interment. Twenty oaly had been saved out of the gay, light-hearted one huadred and fifty that had started from Liverpool.

The loss of this steamer caused a profound sensation through Lancashire aad a great part of Wales. It led to greater precautions against wreck being taken on board the Mersey steamers, and several worn-out boats were removed before goverament could examine and condemn them. Many wrecks have involved greater loss of life, but no wreck of the last ceatury has, perhaps, been described more fully, or from more points of view, sixteeu educated survivors having written their fullest recollections of their various modes of escape. —All The Year Round.

A Glimpse of Nuremberg.—Behiad the chapel of St. Maurice, there is a little half-buildiag, nestled between two of the buttresses, in the maaner of the Middle Ages, when sach coigns of vantage were used by the common people as our eaves are used by the swallows. You would pass this house without a secoad glaace—a little gilded bell above the door iadicates nothing. Yet in this old, low cramped, black shed, roasted sausages have been served daily at noon, for 400 years! Hither came all the Nuremberg artists and architects, aad within the smoky chamber (hardly upon the same beaches,) which fifteea persons would crowd, sat Durer and Kraft aud Sachs, precisely as we sat two days ago. The entrance is through the kitchen, which is about six feet square, the people inside greeted us cordially, and we were speedily served with the famous sausages, with sauerkraut, black bread and beer. "A good appetite!" said the waiter boy plumping before us a huge seidel, with the "A. K." (Adam Kraft?) upon the lid. Four of us ate, drank and were filled, for the collective sum of 26 cents. The consumption of sausages amounts at present to 1,500 per day. It certainly brings one aearer to the old masters to eat and drink precisely where and what they did; and so I hope this conservative nook may long be spared by the progressive years. But alas! alas! some of the people of this good old city are becomiag impatieat of their walls and moats, and would fain level, fill up, and let the nineteenth century into the fifteenth. Aaywhere else but here! Let us have one picture unchaaged—oae aest where the decrepit bird of of Fable may brood, for the delight of that future generation which shall see so much less of the Middle Ages than we. Tear down the dark foul alleys where the huaian race wilts and sickens; build railway bridges with the towers of robber-barons, level the defences of a brutal age—but let the world keep Nuremberg as she is, as the Minne-singers, from Walter von der Vogleweid to Longfellow, have seen and loved her.—Bayard Taylor.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO,.....SATURDAY, OCTOBER 19, 1867.

MR. DICKENS' OFFENCE.

IF anything can be more silly or more boorish than the intrusive and vulgar hospitalities thrust upon Mr. Dickens by a certain class of our countrymen, on the occasion of his first, and thus far, his last visit to the United States, it is the angry complaints of his ingratitude for those hospitalities, manifested in his subsequent satires and caricatures in "American Notes" and "Martin Chuzzlewit," founded upon his observations and experiences while among us. Such a complaint implies a feeling on the part of those who make it, that the great novelist ought to have permitted his judgment to be bribed by the annoying attentions which he had not sought, and from which he would have gladly escaped; that because he was in a measure forced into making a show of himself, was compelled to eat innumerable bad dinners, and to drink vast quantities of inferior champagne, was driven to the necessity of keeping a Secretary to supply the demand for his autographs, and of making a wholesale contract with a fashionable barber to enable him to furnish locks of hair to a small per centage of the most importunate applicants, that out of gratitude for these hospitalities, the least that he should have done upon his return to England, was to sit down and write a book "cracking us up" in the style in which Col. Chollop informed Mark Tapley at the delightful backwoods settlement of "Eden," that our people "require to be cracked up." It has been said that Mr. Dickens should have been restrained by a sense of delicacy, from "ridiculing the homely or the lavish hospitality of a generous host." Such talk as this is mere unwholesome and unmanly cant. In the first place, our "hospitality" was not homely;" it was mean, snobbish, vulgar, and codfishy to the last degree. In the second place, to speak of it as the "lavish hospitality of a generous host" is utterly to misrepresent the character, the motive, and the source of the attentions with which our visitor was persecuted. The "generous host" was simply an idle, fussy, and sensation-loving populace. The better and more sensible portion of the American people kept aloof from it, and looked on with feelings of mingled amusement and disgust; they would no more think of pleading that "lavish hospitality" in bar of Mr. Dickens' honest criticism and legitimate satire, than they would of founding a claim for the favorable decision of a judge upon social civilities extended to him, in his individual and private capacity. We cannot well understand how any intelligent American can have failed to recognize the substantial justice of Mr. Dickens' caricatures of our social customs, and our public men, or how any magnanimous American can have taken offence at them. A weaker or meaner man than Mr. Dickens might have been flattered and propitiated by the ovations which he received into "cracking us up." He, however, had sufficient manliness and independence to refuse the miserable bribe, and honestly to record his impressions concerning us. Instead of resenting Mr. Dickens' caricature of the peculiarities of American society, politics and manners, we ought to feel grateful to him for the frank and fearless style in which he has portrayed them as they appear to disinterested observers, and has thus helped us to "see ourselves as others see us." In his delineations of certain types of American character, there are indications of dislike and antipathy, but none of deliberate malice. He has described us, our society, usages, and ideas just as they impressed him, and this should be thankfully acknowledged as a service instead of being bitterly resented as an affront.

AMONG the most noteworthy of the new publications of a strictly literary character, is the American reprint of Matthew Arnold's "New Poems," published by Ticknor & Fields. It is now some ten years since the first collection of Arnold's poems were published in this country. The "notices" of the present volume which we have seen in the daily press of San Francisco, and especially of that most remarkable poem Empedocles on Etna, have been singularly inappreciative. One of the very noblest passages in the Empedocles, is solemnly declared to be "more like the twaddle of a German transcendentalist," than like something else, by an evening contemporary, whose literary critic is either disgusted by the rhythmic effects introduced, or incapable of appreciating the austere classic beauty of the poem.

THE Java made her last passage from Boston to Queenstown in six days and twenty-one and a half hours—the quickest passage across the Atlantic on record.

A CALIFORNIA UNIVERSITY.

THE Bulletin declares that our comments last week upon the decision of the trustees of the College of California to convey their property to the State, are founded upon a misapprehension of the purposes of the conveyance, adding that the resolution to disincorporate, and assign the assets of the College, does not indicate a failure to establish that institution upon a permanent basis, nor that the prospect of establishing a Californian University has been abandoned. The Bulletin further says: "By the action of the Trustees of the College the State will come into possession of a splendid and appropriate site, embracing 160 acres, worth probably at least $60,000, and the further assets of the College, including buildings and grounds in Oakland, may be worth $100,000 more. These properties, added to the land grants made to the State by Congress for University purposes and for a School of Agriculture and Mining, together with the money already accumulated in the State University Fund, will, with such other aid as the State can give, furnish means enough to start an institution of learning that will ultimately be as comprehensive as that of Harvard or Yale. It is a great mistake to suppose the College is to disincorporate in favor of a mere Agricultural College. The Commissioners having the matter in charge, no less than all sagacious friends of liberal education, long ago determined that an attempt to establish an institution so restricted would result in failure, and that the intention of Congress could be more certainly carried out by adding the proceeds of the agricultural land grant to a common fund for the establishment of a University, in which a school of agriculture, mining and mechanics, would be one of the departments."

The Bulletin is also sanguine that in good time those individual bequests and endowments to which the great institutions of learning at the East are principally indebted for their prosperity, will be forthcoming here; that "such men as Hawes, Parrot, Reese, and Hayward, will ultimately do themselves a pleasure, and the State a service, by endowing professorships in branches of learning, to be designated by them and to bear their names." The liberality and public spirit of the distinguished citizens enumerated, are so well known, indeed we might say, are so proverbial, as not only to make the hope expressed by the Bulletin seem eminently reasonable, but also to make it a matter of astonishment that they have not long ago "done themselves the pleasure, and the State the service" indicated.

A HASTY CRITICISM.

A FEW days ago the Bulletin published in its supplement, a sketch written by Prentice Mulford for this paper, and credited the same to Geo. D. Prentice, having probably clipped the piece from some Eastern paper that had borrowed it from the CALIFORNIAN without credit, but retaining the signature of "Prentice," over which it appeared. The Dramatic Chronicle, referring to the matter, says:

"With all the Bulletin's merits and excellencies as a newspaper—and they are many—it has almost always shown greater readiness to appreciate literary wares that come from afar than those that are of home manufacture; and a certain provincial narrowness and churlishness of spirit has marked its general policy towards California Literary papers, and California writers not connected with the daily press. The Bulletin would not have clipped "Nip" from the CALIFORNIAN and credited it to Prentice Mulford; but finding it in an Eastern paper which had copied it from the CALIFORNIAN with Mr. Mulford's nom de plume "Prentice," attached to it, and concluding that "Prentice" can be no other than George D. Prentice of the Louisville Journal, the Bulletin appreciates and appropriates, thus furnishing another illustration of the text in reference to a prophet in his own country."

These comments are not altogether just, and are not borne out by facts. On the contrary, there is no daily journal of first-class standing in the State, that has been so ready as the Bulletin to recognize real and sterling literary merit in our writers prior to, and without regard to any Eastern endorsement. In this respect, that journal has been far more liberal than either the Alta or the Sacramento Union. In proof of this, we could point to numerous poems, sketches, and other articles, written for the CALIFORNIAN that have been copied in whole or in part by the Bulletin. Nearly all of the best poetical contributions to this paper, by Stoddard, Harte, Emily Lawson, and Ina D. Coolbraith, have enjoyed the advantage of the wider circulation of our daily contemporary. We think therfore that the Chronicle's charge against the Bulletin, of "provincial narrowness and churlishness of spirit," etc., is somewhat hasty. If that paper has not been lavish or promiscuous in the recognition it has bestowed, the just reserve and discrimination which it has exercised, have made such recognition all the more valuable.

THE New York Weekly Review of September 14th, says: "From San Francisco we receive a little volume containing the Poems of Charles Warren Stoddard, a young Californian, manifestly gifted with a pure spirit and a lively fancy, who has entered upon a career that is full of promise. To this book also we shall return."

THE SOUTHERN DRAMA.

IN Miss Augusta J. Evans, the South has a great representative novelist; in "Bill Arp," a representative humorist; in "Brick Pomeroy," (Southern by adoption,) a representative satirist. Recently a Southern dramatist has made his (or her) appearance, who promises in his (or her) field to rival the fame of the distinguished authors we have named. A Memphis paper furnishes some account of "Helvington, a Dramatic Story," said to be the work of a Southern lady, though this does not seem to be fully ascertained. "Isabel Rivers," a high-strung young lady of ardent Secesh sympathies is the heroine. Having been obliged by stress of circumstances (not very clearly explained) to take an oath of allegiance to the abhorred Federal Government, Miss Isabel, immediately after completing the ceremonial, thus vents her feelings:

"Oh! God!
Is there a word that human lips e'er spoke,
Or human thoughts conceived, of power and strength
Compressed within its syllables, to express
The hate—the Immortal hate—that fills the heart
Of the true South, for that accursed, that false,
That treacherous Government!"

Notwithstanding her bloodthirsty and ferocious impulses, the young lady is not wholy unsusceptible to the influence of manly beauty. In a tete a tete with her mother, she exclaims:

"I know a youth in Baltimore—he's brave
As he is beautiful.
Mother! the youth loves Liberty! and hates
Tyrants—as the Roman Brutus did;
Let those at Washington took to't.
Knows not the oppressor that the free-born soul
Crushed down, forced to find refuge in false oaths,
Will one day find that thing called Vengeance.
* * * Aye, and 't has often chanced
The hand, even the weak hand of women has Enwrought the almighty's will. * * *
The name
Of him, who sits at Washington, and calls
From the four quarters of the earth for men,
More men, even more men, to drench our land
With human gore—Mother! that name is writ
In blood."

It would seem from the context, more especially from the portions italicised, that the youth, "brave as he is beautiful," is no other than J. Wilkes Booth.

PUZZLE.—Without in the least intending to fall into the Sunday-paper style of publishing acrostics, charades, rebuses, etc., we this week present our readers with a puzle which we think they will confess is decidedly ingenious.

Mrs. G——, of No. — Folsom street, who keeps many servants, was going to a party the other night, and having lost one of the servants, left the following instructions with her maid:

IF UCAN UCME
SEND MRAN AND MECUM.

The language is English, though it does not look like t. We do not offer a gold pen to be divided among those of our subscribers who send us a correct interpretation, but interpretations may be sent to THE CALIFORNIAN office before Friday next.

EDITORIAL COURTESIES.—The Tomahawk, a keenly satirical and not over-scrupulous weekly paper lately started in London, is thus complimentary to the Star, John Bright's organ: "We congratulate Mr. Edmund Yates on his resignation of the post of Flâneur on the 'Star.' The editor of our radical contemporary will now, we suppose, (if we may permitted to judge from the tone of his recent leaders,) be able to declare to the intense delight of the 'Great Unwashed,' that there is not a single gentleman on his staff."

A PROCLAMATION has been posted up throughout Canton forbidding the printing of Chinese newspapers by foreigners. This document purports to be an imperial order transmitted by the Governor-General of the two Kiangs (Kiang-tsu and Kiang-tse) to the Governor of Canton. It has put a summary stop to the existence of a little broad sheet published under foreign editorship there.

THE French poet, Charles Beaudelaire, author of "Fleurs du Mal," "Paradis Artificiels," and a translation of the poems of Edgar Allan Poe, has expired in a lunatic asylum, in his forty-seventh year. He was a man of genius, with an insane love of horribly vicious subjects.

CHARLES DICKENS will give his readings here in the "mild November." Pickwickians, Copperfielders, and Nicklebyites must brush up their lore, for to meet the great Charles and not to have a neat little quotation ready from one of the great novelist's stories would be very un-American.

THE opening chapters of the new novel by Anthony Trollope, illustrated by I. E. Millais, will be one of the leading attractions of Mr. Trollope's magazine, "St. Paul's," the first number of which will be published on the 18th of October.

THE Orchestra announces a forthcoming work, of interest to the musical and literary worlds—a volume of new songs by Tennyson, with music by Arthur S. Sullivan.

SIGNOR VERDI is in Paris. His health and spirits seem to have been somewhat shaken by the failure of Don Carlos which he takes much to heart.

THE greatest lack of self-respect is exhibited in thinking continually of self.

[CORRESPONDENCE:]

THE HOMŒOPATHIC DISSECTING KNIFE

APPLIED TO THE "PACIFIC MEDICAL AND SURGICAL JOURNAL."

TO THE EDITORS OF THE CALIFORNIAN—Gentlemen: My attention has been called to an editorial in the above named journal reflecting on the surgical skill and education of medical men of the New School, a rejoinder to which appears in your advertising columns; which proves, at least, that if homœopaths are ignorant of surgery and other branches of medical science, it is not from any want of abundant means, equal in extent and variety to those of other medical schools, to become duly qualified in all respects in all branches. It appears to me, however, that the article deserves some further notice and in a different shape. It is the second attempt that has appeared in that very feeble infant, of only five months, to vilify and satirize homœopathy, whilst it denies the right of reply to those it feels at liberty to insult. I therefore trust to your sense of public justice and fairplay for this right. The production in question was inspired, it would appear, by the change of the Ophthalmic Hospital of New York, from the allopaths to the homœopaths, a change which seems a cause of great grief to the editors for reasons best known to themselves, and which transfer they account for in so peculiar a manner that the genius of Momus rather than the wisdom of Apollo is required to furnish them a suitable answer. It is roundly asserted that "whatever is done in Gotham," as to public institutions, "comes of the devil!" This is doubtless a very ready and convenient sort of logic to settle a knotty point; but it is a little late in the day for a medical philosopher to take fast hold of the devil's tail to pull him out of tight places! There are still some who follow an old practice, and

"Compound for sins they feel inclined to
By damning those they have no mind to."

It is, however, we take it, a pleasant rhetorical flourish to impress us with the fact that the two great powers that control the moral aspect of the universe are arrayed as usual against each other to settle the claims of these rival parties! And inasmuch as his majesty of the infernal regions holds now the reins of power in Gotham, it has become of necessity a "monstrous human sewer!" In his lower dominions he allows no water—the figure is not at the best a clean one; but this is of course, on such a Pegasus—

"For what's expected from a horse
With an apothecary on his back?"

In which monstrous place "the only good thing done for many years past was the appointment of regular physicians to sovereign authority when ghastly cholera" approached the city last year! The result proved the wisdom of the appointment; for Cholera seeing from some distant cloud over the Atlantic an impregnable allopathic fortification, declined the challenge and made a detour toward the southwest. But the Cholera of 1866 could not have been acquainted with the progress of its forefathers in 1831–32, the city being thus protected "legally and regularly," by the same prarties. For we find that the enemy scaled the walls somehow, attacked 5,232 persons, and slew 2,031, or nearly two-fifths of the number! But we find also that the homœopaths of that period, presuming to attack the same enemy in the most irregular and illegal fashion, without civic authority or appointment, managed to save two-thirds of those who were mad enough to trust them—and this, not only in New York, but throughout Europe! The inference which we are expected to draw from the "extreme wickedness" of New York, to our own advantage, is not clear either; for this city, and indeed all other cities are equally degraded and demoralized in proportion to the population. The next strong point the writer makes is, that the allopaths "were voted out" and the homœopaths voted in," by the "half accidental fact" (sic) that the directors found, at a meeting, that the majority were homœopaths." Now, if this had not been so, it would have been the other way, would it not? But what is a half accident? and what is a quarter accident? Would the fracture of the tibia be the "half," that of the fibula, the other half accident?—and a "fact" implying design, agency and execution, it does not seem clear how it can turn into "half accidental."

But perhaps the plain facts in the aggregate are, that a large majority of the intelligent and wealthy gentlemen who manage the hospital have learned from experience and observation that one mode of treatment was in every way superior to the other, and ordered the charity to be placed in the hands of those they thought best able to apply it. Has it occurred to the reflecting editor to inquire how this majority came to exist at all; how such convictions are produced; how, from one homœopath, about forty years ago, New York comes to have over 500? How the same proportion holds good in every town and city in the United States; how they have come to have "and to hold" large and respectable patronage; how they manage to have six well organized and legalized medical colleges of their own, with professorships for every branch of medical science and art? How, from the imperial palace of Russia, through every grade of station, wealth and intelligence, homœopathy commands and holds influence, place and patronage throughout all Europe, even in a greater proportion than in this country? And how all this comes from the enlightened, educated and progressive classes of the people? When these questions are answered, and when it is borne in mind that even San Francisco is no exception, perhaps both halves of the accident will appear. We are next told that the "name of Carnohan is known all over the world," and those who take his place "not known on this side of the highlands of the Hudson!" We grant this, and that Carnohan deserves it too. But what of it? Was there not a time when he was not known, and may not the time come when the others shall become known "all over the world?" The learned editors were once themselves unknown; but see, after their editorial labors against homœopathy, where they shall be!—they can say, with the ancient poet: "We shall touch the lofty stars with our heads!"

"Sublimi feriam sidera vertice!"

It is well that the learned editor, through kindly consideration, informs his professional readers that "an ophtalemic hospital has to deal largely with surgery!" And then triumphantly demands, with unanswerable assurance—"And what has homœopathy to do with surgery, we should like to know?" "where is the point or edge of 'similia similibus' when it comes to an operation?" or, "can the 'allopathic' knife be dispensed with, and its work done by infinitesimal doses of imagination?" Now, in pity to the very limited range of our knowledge, he should have added that the hospital has to "deal largely" with therapeutics. Since all deseases affecting the eye do not require surgery at all, but must be treated constitutionally. Homœopathy professes to have nothing to do with surgery, It deals only with the administration of medicines, and similia similibus "curantur" has no surgical "edge or point." It is only the formula which expresses the law on which homœopathy is founded, and therefore never "comes to an operation." Yes, the "allopathic knife" can be dispensed with, and always has been dispensed with; inasmuch as such an instrument has never existed; for "allopathy" expresses only the peculiar mode or system on which a certain class of medical men dose their patients. But the surgical knife can never be dispensed with, whether it is in the hand of a skilful operator who prefers to give medicine according to the homœopathic law or allopathic system, when needed by his patient. And now, as you "should like to know," we have informed you. And, we ask in our turn, what has jalap, epsom salts, calomel or tarter emetic, in destructive or prostrating doses, to do with surgery? And where is the point or edge of "contraria contrariis" "when it comes to an operation?"

There is no one so ignorant as not to know that the administration of medicines by the mouth is one thing, and surgical operations another. It is equally well understood that the only difference between the two schools has reference only to the law which should direct the administration of remedial agents to the sick, and the quantity of medicine that should be given in any single case. Outside of this all is common-ground; there is neither clashing nor difference of opinion. And this view of the subject has been most prominent before the public and the profession in all its aspects for the last sixty-four years!

Have we not a right to demand, then, why two men, who set themselves up as exponents of medical literature and science on this coast, should dare to insult, after this fashion, a body of men who are in general as well qualified and educated as it is possible for medical men to be, by roundly stating that they expect to cure cataract by a drop of the hundredth dilution of belladonna, to amputate a limb with a globule of arnica, or conduct a case of preternatural labor by sprinkling some drops of secale over the patient's coverlet? Or is it their object to pass off this slander on that portion of the people who only know this subject by name, and thus "damage homœopathy" by a gross fraud? If they mean what they say, they are ignorant below contempt. If they do not, they seem to hold but lightly what every gentleman values as he does his life: his reputation for truth!

As to the attempted pun, so far fetched, and so hardly squeezed out of the similitude of Niagara as a cataract, and a cataract on the eye, with which the article concludes, the editors will find that waterfall, in view of the moral aspect of the above "situation," what the tailor once pronounced it—"a wonderful fine place to sponge a coat!"

SAN FRANCISCO, in proportion to its size, is the busiest seaport in the world. Her annual exports are about $70,000,000, and her imports nearly as much; the manufactures are worth nearly $20,000,000; the real estate sales amount to about $12,000,000, and the cash value of the land, buildings and movable property of the city is about $200,000,000, although assessed for taxation at only $80,000,000. She sends away about forty tons of silver and six tons of gold every month—the former metal in bars fifteen inches long and five inches square; the latter in small bars about six inches long, three inches wide and two inches thick. Wagons loaded with the precious metals are seen in our streets nearly every day.

THE poet's or the conqueror's wreath is poor compared with that made for us by the encircling arms of those we love.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

DAN BRYANT has taken a firm hold on the somewhat fickle public of San Francisco, and every night Maguire's Opera House is crowded. The new play of Inshavogue has proved a hit. A matinee will be given to-day, when this rollicking Irish drama will be performed, and in the evening the same play will be repeated On Monday the celebrated play of Arrah-na-Pogue will be produced with all the original scenery, stage effects and music. There is a very general desire to witness Dan Bryant's minstrel performances. The fame of "Dan Bryant's Minstrel Troupe" is world wide. It is rumored that, conceding to a very generally expressed wish, Dan Bryant will, before he leaves this city, appear in burnt cork and give the public a taste of his quality as an Ethiopian comedian.

On Saturday last Miss Caroline Hamilton made her first appearance on any stage at the Metropolitan Theatre, when Mr. Hamilton took a benefit. Miss Hamilton appeared in the character of "Julia," in The Hunchback. It was evident to all who had witnessed the performance of that talented actress, Miss Caroline Chapman, that Miss Hamilton had been (as was formerly announced) schooled by her aunt. Unfortunately, Miss Hamilton imitated Miss Chapman with too much fidelity, and her rendition of "Julia" was very parrot-like. Occasionally Miss Hamilton would, in an attempt to show passion, burst forth in a scream. With a little experience of the stage, Miss Hamilton will probably succeed as an actress. On the second occasion on which she appeared—Thursday evening—she played the part much better than on the occasion of her debut, and evinced an intelligence with regard to the points in dramatic business which renders it safe to prophecy that if Miss Hamilton studies hard and devotes herself in earnest to the profession she has adopted, she will attain a good position. J. H. Vinson played "Master Walter" admirably—the part has seldom, if ever, been better performed in this city. Mr. Vinson's conception of "Master Walter" is a just one. He does not rave and storm through the play, he is not always peevish and ill-natured, but he portrays the character of the kindly-natured hunchback correctly. Miss Clelia Howson was excellent as "Helen," evincing a talent for high comedy for which many who had witnessed her burlesque impersonations did not give her credit. John Howson made a capital "Modus," playing the part very well indeed. On Wednesday The Hunchback was played with the same cast as before, with the exception that Mr. Bates, who kindly volunteered for the occasion, played "Sir Thomas Clifford." Monday and Tuesday were devoted to English Opera, and good houses showed that the San Francisco public appreciate good music.

On Thursday night the promised spectacular play of Azael was produced. This play comprises all the features which should ensure popularity. All must admire the beautiful music of Auber which is introduced, the spectacular effects are grand, the scenery and dresses are very fine, and the play, as a whole, though the camel is missing, must prove a success.

On Thursday next, Henri Herbete, who is to California what Sims Reeves is to the sweetest voiced tenor in the land of England, will take a farewell benefit. Everyone who knows Herberte likes him, everyone who has once heard his beautiful voice wishes to hear it again, and all who have any love for music will be present at Platt's Hall on Thursday, October 24th, when an entertainment, which has seldom been equalled, will be given. Miss Emma Howson, Miss Clelia Howson, Messrs. Harry Leslie and Harry Raynor, the Motet and Madrigal Society, "The Twelve," and in fact the best artistes in the city will assist.

TOUCHSTONE.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The pleasant weather which we are now enjoying leads many to resort daily to Woodward's Gardens, where they can luxuriate in the conservatories filled with rare plants, lounge in the Art Gallery and view the paintings and pieces of sculpture, roam through the Museum and inspect the numerous curiosities and otherwise while away the day.

THE CITY GARDENS.—There are few places in San Francisco or its vicinity where friends may walk, talk and enjoy themselves. The City Gardens are a most delightful rendezvous. The moonlight concerts are quite the fashion, and the élite of San Francisco society may be seen at the City Gardens.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—Among other fine anatomical models to be seen at this institution, is one of the hand, and another of the foot of the Irish giant, whose skeleton is preserved in the museum of the College of Surgeons, London.

THE London Athenæum says: "Everybody will be glad to hear that the paragraph now running through the press, to the effect that Mr. Charles Dickens is suffering from an acute and mysterious disease—thereby causing that gentlemen's friends, the whole reading public, very great alarm—has no foundation of truth whatever. Mr. Dickens is living at his pleasant Kentish house, busy with his work, and enjoying the most perfect health; combining, to use a few of his own words, his 'usual sedentary powers with the training of a prize-fighter.'"

KISSING HER FEMALE COUSIN.

BY T. B. ALDRICH.

Your coming in last night, my lady love,
Was somewhat sudden. I was helping Nell
To tie the ribbon of her ringlets:
She put the crimson of her mouth up—well,
I'm flesh and blood—and then you, singing, came Into the room, and tossed your head for shame.

I saw a sort of maiden northern lights
Shoot up your cheeks and tremble in your eyes;
I like such things. I like to see the wind
Drive frightened clouds across the skies;
I like the sea, and, when it's easily had,
A pretty woman—very, very mad!

I like the dangerous and regal air
(You bear a queen's name, and a queen you are,)
With which you donned your Thibet opera cloak,
And clasped it with a diamond like a star.
'Twas charming in my mistress—but, my life,
It would not be so charming in my wife.

I like wild things, as I have said, but then
I should not like to own them. Who would be Proprietor of earthquakes, or loose hurricanes,
Or comets plunging in celestial seas?
Or wed a maid that could, if she should please,
Give me a touch of one and all of these.

Not I. Don't let a female thunder storm
Brood in your eyes, with every nod, and then
A flash of angry lightning. You have had
Your March and April; now in June again,
And let your fine-cut eyebrows' silken span
Be brows of promise to your favorite man.

I've had my laugh, and you your pout, and now
(You'll spoil that rose-bud if you twist it so!)
Give me both hands, that I may say, "Good Bess,
The good Queen Bess," and kiss you ere I go—
The good Queen Bess, whose heart, and mind, and face,
Teach me to love all women—as a race!

So, when I kissed your pretty cousin Nell,
I honored one who taught me to admire
Fair women in their twenties—don't you see?
But then, dear Bess, as I was standing by her
Her lips quite close—now this is entre nous—
Upon my soul, I made believe 'twas you!

SOMETHING ABOUT JAPAN.

THERE is no more striking example of the rapidity with which the world moves than that which is furnished by the thought of our relations to Japan. It is only fifteen years since Perry started with his squadron to break the silence and seclusion in which, for centuries, this hermit-nation had buried itself; and most of our readers can recall something of the intense interest and curiosity which attached to his romantic expedition. Now that the world has been so thoroughly tracked and trodden over, and every continent and island of the sea explored, it would be difficult to reproduce the romance which invested the departure of the squadron; it was like some adventurous quest of olden times, rather than a nineteenth century reality. Of the lands toward which this voyage of rediscovery was directed, only enough was known to stimulate the curiosity of the world and to give zest to its appetite for fuller knowledge. Enterprising navigators, coasting along the shores of Niphon or of Yeddo, had caught glimpses of the people and their busy life. Now and then, "some forlorn and shipwrecked brother," who had been cast away on these inhospitable coasts, had been caged and carried on a reluctant pilgrimage through the interior; and if, after a while, he escaped, he had a strange story to tell in which complaints of doleful captivity were mingled with admiration at the beauty of the country and the peculiar civilization of the people. Besides all this, we had old Kæmpfer's history, of two centuries ago; and we might see through Dutch spectacles, if we would abuse ourselves to do it, what this strange empire was where it touched the outer world at Nagaski. But this was not enough. For two centuries these islands had been almost as much out of the world, as if the long waves of the Pacific had rolled over them, instead of breaking against them. When our new world on the western shores of the Atlantic rose suddenly into history, this old world on the western shores of the Pacific, as suddenly disappeared. The curtain fell upon a scene of savage madness, of persecution, massacre, and ferocious revenge. The last sight which the world had of Japan was at Simabarra, where the Christain converts whom the Portuguese missionaries had gained, and who could not be brought by menace or torture to disavow their faith, were summarily exterminated. What made the scene more ghastly was to see the mercenary Dutch traders, whose choice of mammon before God was perhaps the most deliberate and infamous in history, standing by in unprotesting silence, or assisting at the dreadful crime with active and efficient connivance.

It is noteworthy that the curtain which had fallen upon this scene of carnage was to be lifted by the nation which, at that very time, was just emerging into life. The year 1638 is given as the date of the extermination of the last Christian in Japan. It was in 1620 that first Christian settlement at Plymouth was begun. It is one of those coincidences of history which are more than accidental. For out of the Plymouth colony was to come that nation that should bring resurrection to this self-buried empire. Fifteen years have passed, since the work began, and it is wonderful to see how perfectly it has been completed, and the dead are raised.

Twice already there has come an embassy from the Tycoon to the President, and we have seen them going up and down in the land, peering, with intelligent curiosity in their mild eyes, at whatever things are noteworthy in the new world which they have entered. To-day the most attractive of our popular amusements in the performance of the jugglers who have come, and still are coming in successive companies, from Japan. Have we not all seen their demure faces, and heard their queer, shrill voices, and wondered at ther cunning disregard of impossibilities, and their fearless conflicts with the law of gravitation? Have we not all rejoiced with trembling, when the discordant music of the drum and tam-tam and guitar ushered in the classic "All right" and the tubs and ladders? Have we not rubbed out eyes with incredulity, when those amazing tops spinned up the arm, and around the neck, and down the back of the serene gentleman with the polysyllable name, who meanwhile fanned himself with placid satisfaction? Our streets are full of placards with queer, oriental devices on them. Our newspapers are full of items concerning the habits of these strangers. Even our police reports, alas! indicate that they have come to grief, and fallen among the lawyers and judges of the metropolis, already. Large orders for school books, for steamboats, for men of war for military accoutrements, for notions of various sorts, come to our merchants at San Francisco, and New York from Yeddo. Two-sworded princes, naval officers, with their retinue, arrive to make inspection of our navy-yards. There are Japanese in our school and academies. A monthly line of steamers connects their shores with ours. California salutes Niphon across the Pacific as almost her next neighbor; and from our new northwestern possessions, the peninsula of Alaska stretches out in a still more close proximity, suggesting a manifest destiny of intimate commercial and social intercourse. Fifteen years more, and we may see this peninsula, with the chain of islands stretching west and south from it, recognised as the foreordained route of telegraph cables; and we shall get the news from Yeddo daily at our breakfast tables, as a thing of course. * * * * *

As we approached Niphon one clear afternoon, we was a hundred miles or more away towering above the northern horizon with regular and delicate outline, the sharp blue cone of Fusi Yama.

There are some higher mountains than Fusi Yama in the world, but if there is one more beautiful I do not know it. To the Japanese themselves it seems to be a joy forever." And to every foreigner it is a beautiful surprise. I cannot conceive of any mountain lines more graceful than those with which it rises from the shores of the bay of Yeddo, and dips again among the lesser mountains of the unexplored island. Its regular conical shape is broken at the summit by the crater out of which, within a century, volcanic fires have burst, and its sides, for a considerable distance from the top are whitened with perennial snow. It is so near the shores of the island that it is visible far out at sea. Indeed, it partly owes its singular beauty to the fact that it may be so easily observed from a sufficient distance. Other mountain peaks are so much a part of the ranges to which they belong, that it is difficult to isolate and individualize them. But Fusi Yama towers above the mountain ranges of Niphon unapproached and unapproachable. It is more than two miles high, and almost from the base to its sharp summit, the eye may take it in with one unbroken glance. I do not wonder that the Japanese are proud of it, and hold it sacred and make pilgrimages to it, and climb its stately sides with half-adoring reverence. It is the first and greatest feature of their scenery. And in all their pictures of Japanese life, on lacquered trays or in innumerable picture-books, it is a most conspicuous object. The fishing boats in Yeddo bay look to it as their weather prophet, for the clouds that settle on its stately head are heralds of the storm. And far off, a hundred miles to the southward or the westward it towers thin and faint but regular and perfect, transfigured into the very ghost and airy vision of a delectable mountain. Such it appeared to us as we approached the harbor of Simoda. For one, I could not keep my eyes away from it, but watched it through the afternoon until the flush of sunset settled on it. And the next day though we were close beside the smoking volcano island of Oho-sima, at which, as my first volcano, I was bound to wonder, and from which the clouds of vapor poured incessantly, and though the pine groves of Cape Idzu waved almost within our hearing, still there was nothing to compare with the majestic beauty of great Fusi Yama.

I envy the man who shall first explore the natural scenery of Japan, and the occidental feet which shall stand first upon the sides of Fusi Yama. Any one can see from the very configuration of the group of islands that they must be full of picturesque beauty. Their breadth is at best, so narrow; and their coast line so deeply and so frequently indented; and they rise so high above the sea, that the brooks and rivers which are formed upon the highlands must plunge seaward in splended cataracts and through wild glens and valleys with an endless and charming variety of landscape. Beauty enough at every step we found when we went ashore at Simoda; not the languid beauty of the tropics which we had left behind us in Siam, nor the flat ugliness of Shanghae, from which we had more recently escaped; but the fresh life of merry mountain brooks and the green hills and rugged rocks and pine-crowned mountains of a climate hardy as our own New England. There was everywhere the beauty of cultivated fields, of terraced hillsides, of road-side flowers and shrubs. If only we might have gone inland and explored the picturesqueness of the interior!

A few weeks later, at the more northern port of Hakodadi, we had the chance to make excursions ten or twelve miles from the shore, in this very month of October. I do not know how often, as I walked about the country, I was reminded of home, for Hakodadi is in the same latitude with New York, and the climate, and the look of the landscape, and the trees and flowers and ripened harvests all about us, were the same one sees in our own land. A spotted lily or a yellow golden-rod, or tall hollyhocks beside the road, or the bright asters blossoming among the graves, carried ones thoughts across the leagues of ocean and of continent to the remotest West and to the familiar scenes of home. Here in Japan, as in Connecticut and New York, the fields were white with the blossoming harvest of buckwheat; and we even continued the resemblance so far as to make it furnish us the buckwheat cakes for breakfast which we would have had in Yankee land. There were yellow pumpkins which in New England would have prophesied eloquently of Thanksgiving day. Our maize or Indian corn had just been gathered here—though how these Japanese had come by what was reckoned as exclusively an American production, I could not imagine. There was the cool and bracing weather of our own October climate, and the smoky October air softening all the landscape, and the "vapor-braided sky" above, and the grass beginning to look dry and brown, and chestnut trees waiting till the frost should open their green burs, and forests that should presently put on their Autumn colors—all these were so familiar and so home-like, that to find them in Japan was a perpetual surprise. We had not sufficiently remembered that the stretch of the coast lines of these islands is through the very same parallels with our Atlantic shores—from the latitude of Portland on the north to that of Savannah on the south. Yeddo is in the latitude of Norfolk and Richmond. Hakodadi is, as I have said, on the parallel of New York. Probably the climate is a little tempered by the insular position of Japan, and the scenery is wilder and more striking than the scenery of our Eastern seaboard. We have no volcanoes, for example; while from Simoda, we had in sight the smoking crater of Oho-sima, and from Hakodadi two more volcano peaks were distant only a few leagues. But, so far as the climate and the country are concerned, there is nothing to repel but everything to attract the immigration of Americans. For one, I could choose no lovelier place to live and work in than the shores of the magnificent bay of Hakodadi, or the hills at the foot of Fusi Yama that overlook the broad Pacific.—Rev. George W. Bacon, in "Hours at Home."

A LEOPARD KILLED BY A TIGER.

In the end of March, 1865, I was encamped in the Teraire and borders of the forest under the Himalaya hills. Some of my mahoots, who had gone out to cut fodder heard the cries of an animal, resembling those of a pig when in the claws of a tiger. They left the jungle at once, and reported the circumstance to me on their return to my camp. After breakfast we started for the jungle, but on beating it no trace of the pig or its remains could be seen. We found, however, a very fine leopard measuring over six feet, dead, but not yet cold. On examining it there were no marks of bullets visible. A portion of the skin of one hind leg had been torn off, and blood issued from the skull, which yielded to the pressure of the finger. On removing the skin the skull was found to be smashed in and fractured, so much so that several portions of of the bone came away with the skin. There were also two or three marks, such as would be found on any animal that had been struck by a tiger's paw. This is the first instance I ever heard of a tiger killing a leopard, and can only account for it in the following way: First, that the leopard, hearing the cries of the pig when seized by the tiger, approached incautiously, and was struck on the head by the tiger's paw. Second, that the leopard was killing the pig when the tiger came up and took it away from him; in doing so doubtless a fight took place, ending in the death of the former. Our not finding the pig may have arisen from the pig making off when the tiger left him to attack the leopard, or vice versa; for on one occasion I saw a pig crawl away, though very severely hurt, after he had been seized by a tiger which we put up in beating. On this occasion we put up the tiger not one hundred yards from where the leopard was found dead, but, unfortunately, he was not bagged.—Breech-Loader.

N. T. WHITCOMB.

Not long ago a delegation of Indian Chiefs from the Far West, who had been on to Washington on business connected with their tribes, passed through Cincinnati en route for their homes. One of their number became so infatuated with lager beer that he was left behind. The following touching parody on Bingen on the Rhine was suggested to the "Fat Contributor" by seeing the noble red man in a beer garden, engaged in the wild and hopeless task of drinking old beer drinkers tight:

BIG INJUN OVER THE RHINE.

An Injun sat in a garden,
Drinking his lager beer,
He had left his wigwam on the plains
And his squaw she wasn't near;
But a Dutch girl stood beside him
To hear what he should say,
And replied to his Injun jargon—
"Nix cum heraus, unt nix verstay."

This heery Injun bluhbered
As he took that Dutch girl's hand,
And said, "Me never more shall see
Me own, me native land;
Bear a message—and a scalp or two—
To those distant friends of mine,
For I am a Big Injun—
Big Injun over the Rhine."

"Tell my mother that her other sons
Shall comfort her old age,
Chase the buffalo, scalp the drivers
Of the overland mail stage;
For my father was a warrior hold,
And e'en as a papoose,
I joyed to know that the old man,
Was 'sound on the goose.'
And when he died and left us
To divide his scanty hoard,
I let them take what e'er they wonld,
But kept my father's gourd;
Now take and fill it high with heer,
Let's see the lager shioe—
Gross glass for the Big Injun—
Big Injun over the Rhine.

"Tell my sister not to whimper
Because she misses one
When the Injuu delegation
Comes hack from Washington;
But look upon them prondly,
And never shed a tear,
Her brother's the only Injun
As ain't afraid of heer.
And if some brave her lo[illegible]
Then it would please me much,
If mingled with his Injun blood
Was just a shade of Dutch.
I'd drink his health in this old gourd,
(My father's gourd and mine,)
For the honor of Big Injuu—
Big Injun over the Rhine."

His voice grew faint and hoarser,
His legs seemed limp aud weak,
He heckoned feehly with his gourd,
Hiccnped and ceased to speak.
A policeman hent to lift him,
The task it wasn't light,
The savage from beyond the [illegible]
Lay cross the table tight.
And the soft moon rose np slowly,
As the lights seemed hurning lower,
And the loud Tentonic music
Was drowned hy the Red Man's snore.
He fell early in the battle—
'Twas only half-past nine—
This hoastful, beery Injun—
Big Injun over the Rhine.

[Trade Mark Registered.] WHITING & BERRY.
This is the only exclusive Tea, Wine and Spirit Store on the Pacific Coast.
It is neither a saloon or sample room, (as no wine or spirits are permitted to be drank on the premises,) but a depot where selected Teas and Pure Wines and Spirits may be procured at wholesale or retail for medicinal and family use. In this respect it is our aim to vie with Binninger & Co., New York, Bigelow & Dawes, London, and Cozzen & Co., of Washington, where every facility is offered to ladies as well as gentlemen in making their own selections and purchases in quantities to suit.
N. B.—Our Treatise on Wines, Spirits and Teas, may be had at our depot gratis, and will be mailed to consumers and dealers in the interior when requested.
WHITING & BERRY,

The Ladies are of one mind in pronouncing BOWMAN'S AMERICAN WASHING COMPOUND the best preparation for washing and cleaning in use. It is acknowledged to be a saving both in money and labor. The Compound softens the dirt, consequently the clothes require not more than one-half the rubbing necessary in washing by the old method; besides all who give it a trial acknowledge that their clothes are made whiter in washing with this Compound, than they were ever known to be by using any other preparation. For washing Woolen Goods and Flannels it cannot be equaled. Calicoes that can be washed with soap, without fading, are washed in the water used for boiling the white clothes. This Compound has been used in the eastern States for the past three years with perfect success. Warranted not to injure the clothes. For sale by all Grocers.

THE LAST MINCE PIE.

A YANKEE ROMANCE.

CHAPTER I.—She threw herself npon his breast and wept.

CHAPTER II.—As she ceased weeping, he groaned audibly. There they sat entwined in each other's arms for about two hours, and nary one spoke.

CHAPTER III.—A voice fractured the solemn stillness of the air. 'Twas Eugene's. How sweet, my own love Harriet, if I but had a mince pie to eat. Then she lifted her tear dimmed eyes to the starry heavens, clasped her hands wildly, and exclaimed :

"Come with me to the kitchen, love, and thou shalt eat thy fill, for there were three of 'em left at dinner."

They clasped each other by the hand, and rushed to the pantry.

CHAPTER IV.—Two mince pies had disappeared, and the third was about to share the same fate, when a stealthy step was heard.

"Fly, my angel—my beau! 'Tis the old woman, I know!" And she fell faintiug at his feet.

CHAPTER V.—The old woman stood face to face with Eugene—and she asked him what he had been doing with the gal? He said he hadn't done nothing." She seized upon the remaining pie, and with the ferocity of a tigress she chucked it at him.

CHAPTER VI.—Her aim had been too true. She hit him in the pit of the stomach, and he fell at her feet a corpse. They buried them both in one grave, and every Spring the village maidens plant onions over the place where lie the two lovers at last united.

NEWS.—The word "News" is not, as many imagine, derived from the adjective new. In former times, between the years 1595 and 1730, it was a prevalent practice to put over the periodical publications of the day the initial letters of the compass thus :

N

importing that these papers contained intelligence from the four quarters of the globe ; and from this practice is derived the term "newspaper."—Dictionary of Dates.

Fair Invalid—"Lor', Jane, I do feel that bad! Do, please, make me a tumbler o' brandy and water, as hot and strong as you can—and —just make me take it whether I will or no!"

A MAN named Tease has married a Miss Cross in St. Louis. He Teased her till she agreed she wouldn't be Cross any more.

THE SNUG.—"The Snug" bas heen located one door below Maguire's Opera House, for ten years past. It was established for the convenience of the habituates of the Opera House, and bas the reputation of dispensing the best wines and liquors in the city, under the charge of its present proprietor, Mr. Timothy McCarty. Entrances from various parts of the Opera House to the bar bave been cut, for the convenience of the public. Mr. McCarty gives bis entire attention to his guests, and renders his establishment a "Snug" place by day or night.

"You may talk to me of Baltimore and Philadelphia and New York, and their railroads and the trade of the Atlantic—let me tell you that the Pacific coast is already beginning to revolutionize the world."—Speech of the Hon. Wm. H. Seward to the people of Annapolis, Maryland, June, 1867.

ADDRESS

TO THE PERMANENT CITIZENS OF THE PACIFIC STATES AND TERRITORIES.

CITIZENS—We enjoy the finest country that the sun shines on, the most varied and fertile soil, the most extensive seaboard, and the greatest breadth of land having the richest metallic deposits possessed hy any one nation of the earth, a land affording all the most varied material for manufactures, wools, hides, cotton, silk, coal, fibre gums, wood, and, above all, abundance of every kind of food.

We are only a million of people, and yet have more land and sea than Russia with sixty millions—more land than France and Germany with their hundred millions of people. In the face of those vast resources, there are towns crumbling to decay, men seeking without finding employment. Something wrong here or this would not be happening. Let us consider.

The instructed mind of the population is nearly devoted to political office-seeking. Their ambition is misdirected. The rising youth are trained to idleness. This mode of thinking and training must be reversed if we would hold this magnificent country against the incoming barbarian.

We must teach our youth the glories of manufactures, of commerce, of industry. We must nourish every effort, however rude, at manufacturing what we require. By devoting some of our capital and our young people to manufactures and general industries we shall soon become busy, get rich, bring more and more people into the country, create new wants, build up new factories and villages around them ; cultivate more land, build more ships, generate more commerce, and thereby create profitable employment for all who want work.

Now, fellow-citizens, some money capital is required to help on this industrial movement. Where shall we get it? There is a considerable fund which we may divert from its present hed and channel, viz: the Insurance Fund.

Consider. The people of the Pacific States pay two hundred thousand dollars a month to the Insurance Companies for assuring them against losses from fire or shipwreck.

There are some fifteen of those Insurance offices in this city, each fishing for its share of this large fund. Each office pays a heavy rent, a half dozen officers and clerks, besides printing and advertising ; the lowest cost is a thousand dollars a month on each office, and with some it is double that. There are too many persons employed in the business ; too much dozing over newspapers ; too much red tape and circumlocution ; too high salaries and too little work. Think of two hundred thousand dollars a month! two millions and a half a year!! paid to those sleepy gentlemen for what little they do. This must be reformed. Three or four Insurance offices are quite enough for the million of scattered inhabitants of the Pacific States. A dozen of them may he abolished with great benefit to the community ; some one or two have already withdrawn. This change would liberate some fifty men of education, whose business capacity would be of much greater service to the community in other branches of industry, such as manufactures, agriculture, commerce, the fisheries, the forests and the mines. This change would also divert a million or two of dollars to other and more needful industries, whereby a thousand fold more of national capital and employment would he generated than by the present drowsy system.

The managers of the Builders' Insurance propose, with the co-operation of the people, that this vast monthly stream of wealth shall he arrested and diverted to the aid of home manufactures, to effect a great reform and remove from the people's shoulders the expense of supporting a small army of insurance clerks and agents. The Builders' Insurance Company has passed through its first year (the most trying) with singular success. It has gathered a hundred thousand dollars, paid promptly all its losses, and established a business income of fully twenty thousand dollars a month! This has been done while we were yet but an experiment, and enjoying the confidence of only a portion of the public. We now appeal to the entire people. We ask them to send their insurance business to us on the following conditions, and soon we shall have an income of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS A MONTH, and here is what we shall do with the money :

First, we calculate, from our present experience, that we shall lose by fire and marine disasters half our monthly income (on our first year's experience our "losses" were hut one-third of our income.)

Suppose then that our income shall be worked up to one hundred thousand dollars a month, and euppose that we shall pay out losses to the exteut of fifty thousand dollars a month, we shall still have fifty thousand dollars a month to bank up, (or half a million a year.) We propose to make two parts of this eum—one part (a quarter of a million a year) to be invested in City Bonds, to protect the assured, and one part (about a quarter of a million a year) we propose to convert into a

MANUFACTURERS' LOAN FUND,

Which shall be lent exclusively to manufacturers on mortgage of their premises and machinery, at as low rato of interest and on as long time as ie generally current on real estate.

By the aid of this fund the budding industries of the Pacific States may be nourished into active life; moro and varied employments can bo originated for the people; immigration may be welcomed and not feared ; the farmor will have got a market at his own door for tho produco of his land; the manufacturer will find a lively home domand from the farmer for tho products of his machines.

All this, good people, can be achieved by your own votes at your own firesides, without the aid of Congress or the Legislature—it is simply to vote that your insuranco shal go to the BUILDERS', hy which vote you shall enable us to plant factories all over the country. You shall fill the rivers and harbors with busy ships ; you shall send out upon the distant waves fishing expeditions that will bring back wealth to your cities: you shall form a nursery of seamen around your own shores—the ova of a future commerce and a protective navy; you will create the hum of busy workmen in every desirable locality on the Pacific coast ; you will bring from neglected fields produce of the utmost value; all of which will most certainly multiply a thousand fold the wealth of the country in which your lot is cast, making a worthy home for yourselves and a futurs country for your offspring.

People of the Pacific States and Territories! We pledge ourselves to you to effect, with your co-operation, some of those things. We have kept all our pledges so far, and have uttered nothing that was not true. Already have we helped to move the shuttle and the loom, which others, with more means, have passed by and neglected. Already have we helped to build and rig ships in our own dock-yards, and sent them over the wide waves in search of riches for the city. Already have we given many liberal bounties and donations to the deserving institutions of the city. Give your vote to the BUILDERS'; and we shall share its profits with every useful charity and every honest industry, and help along every enterprise that promises benefit to the people.

We call for the yeas and nays.

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL
ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead ; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner porperty worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.

BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say : "It is, therefore, now the settled law, that the municipal laude held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."

Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.

WHAT AILED HIM.—Dr. Caruthers was called upon one day to visit a young man not far from this city, who had been in a "plug muss," and from all indications was likely to have a black eye as the consequence. An inquisitive individual had learned there was something wrong about the young man's optic, and stopping the doctor on his return, inquired what the trouble was. The learned man informed him that he "found the patient suffering from a severe contusion of the integuments under the left orbit, with a great extravasion of blood and ecchymosis in the surrounding cellular tissue, which was in a tumified state. There was also a considerable abrasion of the cuticle." The fellow scratched his head, looked puzzled, and, after slightly recovering, said: "Yes, doctor, I understand all that; but what is the matter with his eye?"

"HAVE you heard how old Mrs. Barnhart is?" asked a lady of her son, alluding to an old lady who had been ill for some time. "No," replied the young rogue; "but at a rough guess, I should say she's about seventy-four."

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

MARY ANN LEEDOM, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days; or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant, awarding the care and custody of her daughter Julia to plaintiff, and allowing her to resume her maiden name.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

THE DEW OF EDEN.

LADIES OF CALIFORNIA?—If you will keep your complexions in the freshness, delicacy and beauty of youth, you must use the DEW OF EDEN, for it is the only article extant that will do for those using it all that it purports without injury, as it contains no mineral or poisonous substances whatever. It preserves the skin from the effects of climate and atmospheric changes; prevents the formation of Freckles, Tan, Morphew, Sunburn and Wrinkles. It keeps the skin soft, tender and beautiful; because it is congenial and natural to it, and composed of ingredients that supply to it what time and exposure take too rapidly away. It preserves and restores. It is valuable to the young, but more so to those from whom the stern hand of Time is stealing the treasures of youth; to such, it will actually arrest its depredations and avert its ravages upon the human face divine. It will surely smooth out those lines of care to a great extent, and restore the skin to comparative youth. Used on the hands daily, it preserves them in all fineness of texture and delicacy of early years. It gives a beautiful tint to the nails of the fingers, and keeps them tender and soft. It is not a cosmetic, and must not be used with any kind of paint. A simple powder, however, of harmless nature, may be used without detriment with this protective.

No lady once using the DEW OF EDEN will ever afterward dispense with it from her toilet.

WANTED TO KNOW THE NAME OF IT.—A Frenchman, a stranger in New York, stopped a lad in Watts street, and politely asked:

"Mon friend, wat's ze name of zis street?"

"Well, who said it wasn't?" replied the boy.

"What's you call zis street?"

"Of course we do."

"Pardonnez! I have not ze name; what's you call him?"

"Yes. Watts, we call it.

"Zis street?"

"Watts street, old fellow; and don't you try to make game of me."

"Sacre nom de Dieu! I ask you, one, two, tree, several times of ze street, eh?"

"Watts street, I tell you. You're drunk, ain't yon?"

"Mon little fren, vere you live, eh?"

"In Vandam street."

"Eh, Bien! You live von dam street, and you is von d—d fool!"

And they parted, entertaining no high opinion of each other's politeness.

A YOUNG lady went out with a rather timid beau sleighing one evening, complacently remarking to him that she seldom went a sleighing but she got chaps on her lips. The young man took the hint, and chapped.

AN author has easy times in the world; whenever he gets out of money all he has to do is write for more.

WHY are people who stutter not to be relied on? Because they are always breaking their word.

AYER'S PILLS

ARE PARTICULARLY ADAPTED to derangements of the Digestive Apparatus, and diseases arising from Impurity of the Blood. A large part of all the complaints that afflict mankind originate in one of these, and consequently these PILLS are found to cure many varieties of Disease. They are sugar-coated, and hence may be taken readily by the most sensitive and delicate person..

Subjoined are the statements from some eminent physicians, of their effects in their practice:

AS A FAMILY PHYSIC.

From Dr. E. W. Cartwright, of New Orleans—Your Pills are the prince of purges. Their excellent qualities surpass any cathartic we possess. They are mild, but very certain and effectual in their action on the bowels, which makes them invaluable to us in the daily treatment of disease.

FOR JAUNDICE AND ALL LIVER COMPLAINTS.

From Dr. Theodore Bell, of New York City—Not only are your Pills admirably adapted to their purpose as an aperient, but I find their beneficial effects upon the Liver very marked indeed. They have in my practice proved more effectual for the cure of Bilious Complaints than any one remedy I can mention. I sincerely rejoice that we have at length a purgative which is worthy the confidence of the profession and the people.

DYSPEPSIA—INDIGESTION.

From Dr. Henry J. Knox, of St. Louis—The Pills you were kind enough to send me have been all used in my practice, and have satisfied me that they are truly an extraordinary medicine. So peculiarly are they adapted to the diseases of the human system, that they seem to work upon them alone. I have cured some cases of Dyspepsia and Indigestion with them, which had resisted the other remedies we commonly use, indeed I have experimentally found them to be effectual in almost all the complaints for which you recommend them.

FOR HEADACHE—SICK HEADACHE—FOUL STOMACH—PILES—DROPSY—PLETHORA—PARALYSIS—FITS—DYSENTERY—DIARRHŒA—RELAX—Etc., Etc.

From Dr. Edward Boyd, Baltimore—Dear Dr. Ayer: I cannot answer you what complaints I have cured with your Pills better than to say all that we ever treat with a purgative medicine. I place great dependence on an effectual cathartic in my daily contest with disease, and believe as I do that your Pills afford us the best we have, I of course value them highly.

☞ Most of the Pills in market contain mercury, which although a valuable remedy in skillful hands, is dangerous in a public pill, from the dreadful consequences that frequently follow its incautious use. These contain no mercury or mineral substances whatever.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine everywhere.

ALLOPATHIC SLANDERS
On Homœopathy Refuted.

The "Pacific Medical and Surgical Journal" of this city, in an editorial in the number for the present month, tries to give currency to a groundless accusation, to the effect that those who practice medicine according to the Homœopathic law are ignorant of, and obliged to dispense with, operative surgery, and trust to "infinitesimal doses" for the cure of cataract, broken limbs, etc.! To prove that this attempted fraud on that portion of the public who are unacquainted with the subject is prompted by disappointment and jealousy, I publish the following "announcements" of six Homœopathic Colleges in the United States, with their respective Faculties; each College being a legally chartered institution in the State to which it belongs, and in possession of all the rights and privileges of Allopathic Colleges.

J. F. GEARY, M. D.,

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.

QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secrecy, and all Sexual Disorders.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self-Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secresy.

TO FEMALES.

When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, she should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about her troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.

If the case he fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.

Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,

W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.,
San Francisco, Cal

SPERMATORRHŒA.

DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs.

This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of Six Cents in Postage Stamps for return postage. Address,

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.
In the matter of the estate and guardianship of JOSEPHINE M. RICHARDSON, a Minor.
It appearing to the said Court by the petition this day presented and filed by William Harney, the guardian of and for Josephine M. Richardson, a Minor, praying for an order of sale of the real estate, that it is necessary to sell a portion of the real estate of said Minor, to pay the claims now outstanding against it, and that such sale is also necessary to provide for the maintenance and education of the said Minor.
It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said Minor, appear before the said Probate Court, on MONDAY, the 18th day of November, A. D., 1867, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon, of said day, at the Court room of said Probate Court, in the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the aforesaid William Harney, guardian, to sell so much of the real estate of the said Minor as shall be necessary.
And it is further ordered, that a copy of the foregoing order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said city and county of San Francisco.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"THE gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish s an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I WILL roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I WILL aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

"Nil falsi audeat, nil veri non audeat dicere." CICERO.

A Grateful Bow-wow.

We find the following verses in the box of the CALIFORNIAN, without any address; and though we suspect that they have found their way into that receptacle by mistake, and were in reality intended for the Dramatic Chronicle, which, as the most dog-matic sheet in the State, has peculiar claims to be considered as the organ of the "bow-wows," we nevertheless insert it in the "Lion's Mouth," notwithstanding the anomoly of crediting the royal beast with a canine utterance.

VERSES BY PONTO,

Gratefully inscribed to "The Man who Barks at the Pound keeper with his Pen."

Hail to the scribe who in boldness advances,
Honored and blest be the men of his line;
Long may the quill in his fingers that glances,
Flourish to shelter the Dogs of our time!
Heaven send him happy dew,
Earth send him strength anew,
Stoutly to battle and soon overthrow,
While every lane and street,
Send him a welcome meet—
Down with the dog-catchers, ho! iero!

Proudly his challenge has thrilled through the city;
The dog-catchers' groans to that challenge replied;
The Greasers are whining and yelling for pity,
And pound-man and dog-cart lie prone at their side.
Poodle and Spaniel now
Bark with exultant "bow!"
Nor think of the lasso with terror and woe!
That "mounted attendant," too,
Must find occupation new;
Down with the dog-catchers, ho! iero!

Come forth now, ye terriers, ye greyhounds and setters,
Unmuzzled your noses, your tails to the sky,
No more shall low hipeds with pound-cart and fetters
Your liberties hinder, your justice deny!
Ho! for the magic Pen!
Terror of tyrant men!
Honored and blest, let its majesty grow!
Loud shall it speak again,
Ever, for dogs or men.
Down with the dog-catchers, ho! iero!

A Prodigal Son.

The following advertisement appeared in the Bulletin the other day; we gladly give it further publicity, in hopes that it may lead to the wanderer's return:

MISSING!—Information wanted of Joseph McGregor, who left his home last Sunday, and has not been seen since. He is a member of the Sons of Temperance, and is in the habit of drinking hard. Any information regarding him can be left at 409 Sansome street, San Francisco, Cal.

Mr. McGregor "is a member of the Sons of Temperance and is in the habit of drinking hard." Nothing could possibly be more concise. We are given no information as to his height, age, or general appearance; we are left in ignorance as to whether he had a mole on his right cheek and a slight cast in his left eye; we are not told whether the pants which he wore on the day of his disappearance were check, striped or black. It is enough that "he is a member of the Sons of Temperance and is in the habit of drinking hard." Let us hope that this prodigal son has ere this returned to his home and the Sons of Temperance. Let us hope that the relation of his woeful experiences while on a hard drunk has led many to become Sons of Temperance. Then, indeed, that hard drunk will prove a profit, and Joseph Mcgregor will serve as a burning and shining light to warn others off the shoals and quicksands of intemperance on which he nearly suffered shipwreck.

The Real Value of a Mother.

One of the ballad-poets of the day exclaims "Dear Mother I've Come Home to Die," another, envions of his sentimental rival's success, in a materialistic manner remarks, "Dear Mother I've Come Home to Eat." The latter it was, surely, who wrote the following paragraph which appears in many of the daily and weekly papers published in the United States:

CAN A MOTHER FORGET?—Can a mother forget? Not a morning, noon or night but she looks into the corner of the kitchen where you read Robinson Crusoe, and thinks of you as yet a boy. Mothers rarely become conscious that their children are grown out of their childhood. They think of them, advise them, write to them, as if not full fourteen years of age. They cannot forget the child. Three times a day she thinks who are absent from the table, and hopes that next year, at the farthest, she may have "just her own family there." and if you are there, look out for the fat limb of a fried chicken and that coffee which none but everybody's own mother can make."

There is a slight tinge of sentimental feeling in the idea that there is not a morning, noon or night, but your mother looks into the corner of the kitchen where you read Robinson Crusoe, and thinks of you as yet a boy, but how terribly materialistic is the advice contained in the words which we have italicised: "look out for the fat limb of a fried chicken, and that coffee, which none but everybody's own mother can make!" Are there no higher, holier uses for everybody's own mother than to make a "fat limb of fried chicken, and that coffee!" This is just the sort of writing that brings mothers into disrepute, and we have no doubt that if enquiry were made, the editor of the paper who publishes and endorses the above bosh, would turn out to have been a foundling, or else some wretch who, after dissipating his substance, comes home to eat, finds no limbs of chickens, and exclaims: "What? no fat limb of a fried chicken! No strong coffee! Who will care for mother now?"

Ist Schaechten Thierqualerei?

Many of our readers, no doubt, do not care a pinch of snuff whether or not schaechten ist thierqualerein, but others have kinder hearts. Rahhi Kayserling, of Lengnau, Switzerland, has published a book under the title of "Die Ritnale Schachtfrage," or "Ist Schaechten Thierqualerei?" (The Ritual Slaughtering question, or Is slaying [according to the Jewish rite] cruelty to animals?) What has given rise to this publication was the agitation in Switzerland to obtain a legal prohibition of slaying beasts according to the Jewish rite, on the grounds that this mode of killing inflicted unnecessary torture on the animals, and this was against the existing law.

Here is a chance for Bergh, the President of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals in New York, he who has written against cruelty to turtles, in letting them lie for days on a hot sidewalk, and has protested against lobsters being put alive into hot water and gradually boiled, nay, has, we believe, even urged that shrimps should undergo proper schlachtfrage before being boiled. It is all very well for Dr. Kayserling to claim that there is no cruelty in this manner of slaughtering animals, but it will be bad for the Jewish butchers of New York, if Bergh differs in opinion and decides that schaechten ist thierqualerei.

A Kind-hearted, but not Intelligent Jury.

In the case of a man named Riley, who was tried by a jury in Judge Rix's Court this week, for the offense of stealing wine, the jury declared him "guilty," "though they thought he had stolen the wine more for the purpose of gratifying his appetite than from any design to commit a crime." This one of the nicest distinctions ever made by a jury. Most thefts are committed more for the purpose of gratifying the appetites of the thieves than their desire to commit crime. Appetites differ. Some have a great appetite for money, others for watches, others for their neighbors' wives, others again for revenge. In most cases where these appetites are gratified, the design of committing crime is pretty vicent. San Francisco juries are the most kind-hearted in the whole world, and they sometimes sacrifice all reason in their attempt to prevent the judge being "too hard upon a prisoner." A Son of Temperance would declare that the fact that Riley drank the wine after taking it, was a grievous aggravation of his crime, instead of one at should be admitted in extenuation.

Fashionable Intelligence.

Many papers the editors of which were jealous because they knew nothing about the movements of fashionable society, have sneered at the New York Home Journal for chronicling such facts as these: "The lovely and accomplished Miss Summersquash, is, we understand, about to be led to the altar by Adolphus Fleecem, Esquire, a prominent member of the Stock Board in this city," "Mrs. General Flapdoodle, and the three Miss Flapdoodles are at present at Saratoga." "The well-known and wealthy merchant Jeremiah Skultch, of No. — Broadway, seriously ill with Bright's disease of the kidneys," etc., etc. Yet these very papers, remote from the centres of civilization, like to put little bits of fashionable intelligence. For instance, the following clip from one of a late date:

The only daughter of Mr. Spotted Tail, the celebrated Indian chief, is named Izzie Euphemia Pocahontas. She is "finishing her education" at Omaha. She is learning to sing in Italian and play the piano. TREM.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

THE ASSAULT OF PORT HUDSON.

THERE are some days in the existence of almost every man, which stand out sharply and vividly from all the others, long and eventful as his whole life may be. This is peculiarly true of those who have had a military career. There is in the soldier's life as much monotony—perhaps, as much tranquility, as in almost any other; but his episodes of excitement and action, compressed into a few days in the course of as many years, cling to his memory so tenaciously that no time nor change can soften their rugged outlines. All who have ever passed through that awful accumulation of horrors, that stern experience of nervous tension and suffering, a real battle, will readily understand the feeling; and such as have not gain, at least, a faint idea of the reality from the description. Yet, it is emphatically true, that there is nothing in mere words and phrases which can convey an adequate idea of a battle. We can speak and write of its uproar, its emotions, and its terrors; but, after all, the picture will have but a faint impress of the reality. It is something which those who have seen and felt, never wish to see and feel again.

After two weeks of ineffectual knocking at the stubborn defences of Port Hudson, we began to realize that something besides artillery and sharp-shooters were necessary to accomplish the work of its reduction. I will not pretend that I, in common with my twenty thousand brave companions in arms, did not hope, and hope most fervently, too, that the dreadful alternative of an assault might be avoided. I know the soldiers of modern romance, those enthusiastic fellows, whom Charles Lever creates in his books, are supposed to have a noble rage for the strife, and to desire nothing so much as the opportunity to cover themselves with the glory of a close grapple with the enemy in the breach. I frankly admit, that we, who fought before Port Hudson, had no feeling of this sort. We were there to do our duty as soldiers, and had resolved never to shrink from it, when called upon; but, with that natural shrinking from destruction and mutilation which is common to all men who are not maniacs or inebriates, we devoutly hoped that we might not be ordered to throw ourselves against those ominous embankments behind which the rifles of the men of Alabama, of Louisiana, and of Mississippi were flashing in our faces. I plead for myself, as stout a heart and as manly a will, as are found in the average of the men who fought under either flag in the Great Rebellion: and I am willing to admit, that my anxiety on the subject of an assault was as great as that of any of us.

There was not a mail come up the river, during the fiery days of that momentous siege, that did not bring me letters from the North; and, as I saw their familiar writing in the rifle-pits, where every period was emphasized by the humming of a hostile bullet, and read their descriptions of quiet home-life, and its duties and enjoyments, so widely different from all this fiendish work, I believe I had for the moment something less than the soldier's, and something more than the man's feelings.

During the week which preceded the assault, I visited quite often the position of a battery of thirty-twos near the spot where we were located, and watched the operations of the gunners with increasing interest. The reader may believe that my best wishes went with the great globes of iron, as they made their ragged marks upon the face of the works opposite; and I could shout, lustily, with the stout artillerists when a lucky shot hurled a rebel gun from its position, or scattered a cloud of earth from the top of the embankment. Yet, it became easy to see that Port Hudson was not to be taken by mere pounding. The rebel cannon had been dismounted all along our front, the works seamed and torn, and death and wounds scattered broadcast within them; but we were not long in comprehending that we fought a brave and obstinate foe, who would not yield till the last extremity of starvation and endurance was reached. And so it was that we became convinced that there must be an assault; and the question that we chiefly asked of each other was, "How soon will it come?"

Upon Sunday, the 14th of June, that question was answered. Among all the assaults of fortified positions during the war, embracing such bloody and desperate ones as those of Vicksburg, Fort Saunders, Fort Wagner, Fort Fisher, and Fredericksburg, there were very few which can be named before this as a close, sanguinary and stubborn assault. I wish to describe it as I saw it, without the slightest fiction or exaggeration, seeking only to convey my own impressions and experience of it. Whatever mention of myself it will be necessary to make, will be merely as one of some thousands who took part in the work; and my own share in the events of that morning will be given in no vain-glorious spirit, but merely as illustrative of thousands of unrecorded adventures in military life.

The order for the assault came upon the afternoon of Saturday. The company commanders were called together under a tent-fly, where the colonel had his headquarters; and there the work of the morrow was detailed to us.

"Colonel Thomas is sick," said our colonel, "and I am ordered to lead the brigade. I am ordered to take five companies of the 14th; the other five are to stay in the rifle-pits. There is to be a field officer with each. The lieutenant colonel is in command now; he must arrange it as he thinks best. I have no orders to give for the regiment."

"Well, major," said Lieutenant Colonel P——, "how is it? Will you go, or stay?"

"I would prefer to go, if I can select the companies which are to go," replied the major, "But you are in command."

"Suit yourself," said the colonel.

"Then I'll go."

And this was the way these two brave men settled a question of life or death!

The major looked round upon the faces of the line officers; and we knew that upon his lips, at that moment, hung the fate of hundreds. It seems a little thing for one man to say to another, "go," or "stay;" but the will of that one man was to declare whose wives should be widows, and whose children fatherless. I think some thought of this kind was in his mind, for he hesitated and mused gravely as he looked at us.

"Major, I want to go," one of the captains suddenly exclaimed. "My company is a fighting set, and I believe we all want to be in. So don't forget me."

"You shall go," was the reply. "I should have taken you, anyway. Well, I believe I have made up my mind. Step aside as I call you."

We all stood up, a very quiet, serious row of faces, and said not a word.

"Company B." the major called.

"Here!" said Captain B——, and stepped aside.

"Company D."

"Here," answered Captain Knowlton.

"Company E. Captain L——, you will leave your own company, and take charge of Company E; it has no officers present."

"Company F."

And that was mine. "Now," I thought, as I joined the group of the chosen, "you will have a chance to know what stuff you are made of."

Company G. completed the list; and then the colonel gave us a few preliminary words before dismissing us.

"I rode over the ground, this afternoon, with General Wietzel." he said, "and think I understand the position, and the plan of attack' as well as I need. We are to go in through the road which we have been cutting around the hill, near the extreme left. We shall be sheltered till we are very near the works; then we must get in promptly with the bayonet. The skirmishers go first; then a regiment with hand-grenades, to drive the rebel riflemen from the work; then a regiment with cotton-bags, to fill the ditch; then the Eighth Vermont; then we. The old brigade leads the column, you see; and I tell you, it will be glory enough for one day, if we can get into Port Hudson first. The whole division will be at our backs, with as many more as are necessary; and I feel as though the thing was almost done now. Weitzel is confident; he says his division can do anything that he tells them to do, and he has made up his mind to attend church in Port Hudson in the morning. Tell your men that speech, and say to them that it must be so. Now let us all go to sleep. The sargeant major will wake you about one o'clock, when the companies for the storming party will move out, and the others will take the rifle-pits."

We had a little more talk together before we seperated that night. The firing had all been suspended, and the night was still and pleasant. Just for a moment we stood and looked into each others faces, and spoke what hapened to be uppermost in our minds.

"We shall have a tough time," one suggested.

"Pshaw!—no tough time at all," said another, "We shall make a rush, carry the works in five minutes, and the thing is done, with no great loss of life. We are bound to win."

"Sleepless?" the reader will ask. I answer truly, that I slept as soundly that night, as I ever did at home after a hard day's labor, and that I was not even nervous. In fact, I was surprised at my own tranquility. I appreciated the fact perfectly well, that in a few hours I was to cast myself into a whirlpool of blood and slaughter, such as my experience in the war thus far had not shown me; and yet, not only did I find myself able to sleep, but in the few minutes of wakefulness that preceded sleep, I mused philosophically upon the glory of being a soldier, and bearing even a humble part in these heroic times. I have often tried to account for the confident readiness with which I went into this battle, and am now able to explain it only upon the theory that I thoroughly believed our success assured, and that I could not afford to lose the honor of the day.

Lieutenant N——, of Company B, had a presentment of death, such as often seizes the soldier upon the eve of a battle. He declared that it was so clear and distinct that he could not doubt it, and made all his preparations accordingly. His watch, money and rings he entrusted to the hands of one who was to remain in the rifle-pits, and he occupied most of the night in writing a long letter to his wife. The result was, that he passed through the horrors of the next day unscathed, and had the satisfaction of burning up the letter after the fight was over.

Captain Knowlton, of Company R, was one of the most beloved officers of the regiment, and one for whom I bore an affectionate regard; A curious conviction had seized me long before, that he would die early in the war, and on the battle-field. I suppose I must have thought that his handsome face, and proud, soldierly form, could not escape the bullets that always sought a shining mark; and upon this night, that conviction returned and I said to myself, "We shall lose Knowlton to-morrow." But he, too, escaped the dangers of that day without a mark; yet, in the end, my strange prediction was verified. He fought by my side on the front line of the furious battle of Ceder Creek, Virginia, more than a year later, and I caught him in my arms, as he fell with a bullet straight through his white forehead.

With one more of those personal reminiscences, I will pass to the assault. Our Captain T——, of Company G, was one whose superior it would be hard to find. He was a young man of the most brilliant acquirements, a graduate of a New York college, and already, at the age of twenty-two, a licensed preacher. He was an excellent officer, perfectly conversant with military matters, and one of the best disciplinarians I ever new. He was rather small in figure, slender and boyish-looking, with a thin face, a brilliant eye, and a profusion of dark hair which gave his face something of a woman's look. I knew him as well as any of us, and I had discovered that, young as he was, his life was embittered by a hopeless affair of the heart, in which the opposition of the parents of the girl who loved him had separated them, and overcast his otherwise pleasant future. I believe his thoughts were running upon this theme as he took me by the hand and bade me good-by. "It will be dark in the morning, and I may not see you," he said. "I hope you will have any amount of glory;" and he turned away, with his sad smile. Poor fellew; It was indeed "dark in the morning" with him! I never saw him again, until I found him dying on the field.

Calling my company together, I briefly told them what we were to do, and cautioned them to fill their canteens before starting. I repeated the remark of General Weitzel to them, about attending church, the following day, in Port Hudson, and then told them to get all the sleep they possibly could. And when they had returned to their blankets, I wrapped myself in mine, and lay down under the stars to await the coming of the morrow.

I shall not describe the minutiæ of the awakening, the assembly, the preparation, and the march through the woods and ravines of the different divisions of Banks' army, which at five o'clock of that memorable Sunday, burst like a human storm upon the rebel defences I am writing now of individual experience, and cannot dwell upon the detailed plan of attack, or upon the policy of any attack at all, both of which were severely criticized by the press at the time. If my own opinion is of any value, I unhesitatingly say, that at the exigency of the siege which he had reached, General Banks could not escape the evident necessity of an attempt to bring it to a speedy close, and that the plan was a good one, and one that gave great promise of success.

The several brigades of the divisions united at headquarters and marched leisurely, very silently, all with frequent halts, to a point in the woods, to the right o the Bayou Sara road, which ran directly into Port Hudson, At five o'clock it was hardly daylight; the air was cool and misty, and we could recognize faces at our elbows, but could not see the depth of the column. Weitzel's old brigade, his first command, the Eighth Vermont, Twelfth Connecticut and Seventy-Fifth, One Hundred Fourteenth, and One Hundred Sixteenth New York, was in advance. Each of these regiments had its colors already inscribed with the battles it had fought; but by some mistake of military nomenclature, the brigade had received the designation of the "Reserve Brigde," much to the disgust of the men. "Here go your reserves!" were the words which went from mouth to mouth whenever we were moved to the front; and the title finally became such an inconstant absurdity that it was dropped entirely.

The word was given, and the column swung out of the woods at quick-step, and entered the sunk road, which, for a time, perfectly shielded it from the sight and bullets of the enemy. Suddenly a rattle of small arms broke out directly over our heads, where the Seventy-Fifth New York were skirmishing over the works before they were driven back. It was said, with what truth I am not prepared to say, that our assault took the enemy so by surprise, that some of our skirmishers stood on the parapet before the long roll had sounded within, and that had the whole column been thrown directly forward, without skirmishers, it could have entered at once. The reports of their rifles were drowned by the instant breaking forth of a perfect pandemodium of war all about us. The artillery and reserves all along our own lines opened simultaneously with a deafening clamor of large and small guns, and the rebels responded vigorously. The English language has no adjectives expressive enough to do complete justice to the discordant noise that for the next two hours raged around Port Hudson. The "dogs of war" were all unlashed at once, with such a tumult, as the siege, noisy as it had been, had never heard before. The object of this general onslaught of cannon and musketry was to cover our advance; but several of the shell were badly aimed and badly timed, bursting over in our column. One of my company had his arm shattered by a fragment of one of them.

"Fix bayonets!" shouted a familiar voice; and turning to the direction of the sound, I saw General Weitzel at the left of the column. Save the general officer's sword-belt that he wore, his dress would not have distinguished him from a private; and this peculiarity might have been seen throughout the division. The loss of officers from sharp-shooting was so great that all badges and distinctive marks of rank had been prohibited by a general order. The rattle of the musketry grew louder as we advanced, and the wounded commenced to pass us hurrying to the rear; a reminder of what we were about to experience. The road gradually wound up the side of the hill, the perpendicular sides shutting away all view of the conflict that was enacting above, for the Eighth Vermont had already hurled itself against the works, only to be thrown back in disorder, with terrible loss. My company was the second in our battalion, and as we cleared the road, and rushed up the face of the hill. I took in the whole startling scene at a glance. The rebel works rose abruptly before us to a height of more than ten feet, in the form of a retreating angle, with a ditch seven feet deep at its base; and through the air of the early morning (for the sun had not risen yet), patched with mist and smoke, the rifles of the defenders flashed an irregular, incessant stream of fire in our faces, from the top of the work, until it seemed as though a fiery serpent were twisting his coils along its whole length. The hissing and singing of the buckshot through the air never ceased during the assault: the missles, literally, poured upon us in torrents, and hundreds of our brave fellows in blue were strewn over the ground among the rocks and among the bushes, dead, dying and severely hurt; some striving to shelter themselves behind the cotton-bags which had fallen with their bearers. I believe none of these cotton-bags ever reached the ditch; and as for the hand-grenades—they had exploded harmlessly against the face of the work, or had buried themselves without effect in the soft soil of the interior, whence they were returned by the rebels. And there was not a man, I believe, of that whole column, who did not shout at the very top of his lungs. Let a charge once be ordered, and the men will not need to be ordered to shout; the noise breaks out of them instinctively, with the motion of their feet, and the excitement of the moment.

There was an instant's hesitation as we saw the the slain of the brave regiment that had preceeded us, and its officers trying to rally the survivors around its colors; and then realizing that it was a time when every officer must act upon his own responsibility, and observing that many of the men were crouching low behind the rocks and bushes, I waved my sword and shouted "Forward! Will you follow me, men?" I yelled at the height of my voice; and cries of "yes! yes!" assured me that I should not go alone. "Forward, then—forward!" I shouted again, and rushed for the ditch, with the company at my heels. I was within the shadow of the work, when a head was exposed for an instant over the top of it. My revolver was in my hand, and I discharged it twice at the head. It sank out of sight, while cries, "You hit him cap!—You finished him!" came from the men behind me. I leaped into the ditch, and with my sword in my teeth tried to clamber out on the opposite side, while my men tumbled in after me. Half a dozen of them were instantly hit, and either fell or crawled along the ditch, seeking an exit; and while I was still struggling to climb out, I felt a sharp twinge over my left hip, and realized very quick that I was wounded. My strength seemed to leave me instantly, and I leaned heavily on my sword to prevent falling.

I have sometimes been asked, "How does it feel to be wounded?" The first feeling, after receiving a gunshot wound in the body, is as if you had been struck by a club; afterwards the reaction begins, and the pain will be sharp, if the wound be deep. The ditch at this time seemed to me half filled with dead and wounded soldiers. I staggered along, following it until I reached a place which seemed more shallow, where with some difficulty I dragged myself out, and with the help of my sword, tottered feebly down the hill. It is to this day a mystery to me how I escaped being perforated like a sieve, by the storm of balls which flew from the guns of the rebels. There were hundreds of our men, who slightly wounded, were instantly killed while trying to crawl out of the fire; and that I escaped, was due to some special providence, I cannot doubt. The ground before the earthwork, as I now saw it, was literally burdened with slain and wounded; the troops were scattered and disorganized, although new battalions crowded up from below, and charged with fierce shouts, only to be driven back in bloody disorder from the hopeless attempt. As I left the ground, I saw that the attack had ceased to be an attack, and had become a mere butchery. The enemy, perfectly shielded behind their works, poured a continuous fire upon us, without exposure to themselves; and the bravest man in the army could never pass that ditch, which a whole regiment might flounder uselessly in. It was impossible, from the start, to reach the interior of the works; and with this impossibility, mere bravery could accomplish nothing but to exhibit itself.

The sights that met my eye as I descended that awful hill of death, still tottering feebly with the help of my sword, for my strength was fast giving out—were sights which were then graven forever on my memory. Half way down lay the colonel, mortally hurt with a cruel bullet which had severed his spine, just as he turned at the top of the hill to shout encouragement to the men; and, wounded as I was, I stopped and bent over him. "He's almost gone," said one of the men; and his tears fell thick as a girl's, as he looked at the noble face, distorted with pain; but the colonel opened his eyes in a moment, and recognized me. "I'm done for, captain," he said, faintly and sadly, and closed them again.

Still further down there was another form and face which arrested my attention—a face so deadly white that I wondered if I had ever seen it before, until a flash of consciousness in the glazing eye revealed poor Captain T—! He was shot; just above the heart; the glance of recognition that he gave me, was, perhaps, the last that visited his mortal eyes; he died in a few moments. He rests now in a grave in Magnolia Cemetary, at Baton Rouge, and there are very many hearts that are yet saddened with his loss. Requiem eternam da ei, Domine.

I had seen Weitzel's aides several times during the morning, well up toward the front, waiting to report progress; and I passed him as he sat on the trunk of a dead tree near the debouchure of the road. He was smoking a cigar with nervous puffs, and accosted me as I went by. "How is it above, captain?" he asked. "There's nothing favorable, sir," I answered. "We don't seem to make any progress."

I was met at this point by a stretcher, carried by two men; and it came most opportunely. Faint with the wound and my exertions, I was glad to lay my length upon it, and be carried through the woods to the great field hospital, half a mile off. Many regiments passed me, hurrying up to the assault; and more than once the men who bore me stood still, and familiar voices uttered my name, while familiar faces bent gravely over me.

"How's this, cap? Not serious, I hope?" was the greeting which I more than once received during that short journey.

"I think not—I hope not," I would reply; and at last I was deposited on the ground inside an inclosure of branches and cotton-bales, in the midst of several hundreds of wounded men, many of them shrieking and groaning in the most agonizing voices. I think that before I was taken thence, at least, a quarter of an acre of wounded men lay around me. The man on my left died while I lay by him; on my right were Lieutenant S—, of my regiment, with a ball in his leg, and a buckshot in his lung, and who is alive and hearty at this writing; the major, with a shot through his foot; and Captain L—, with a wounded arm. Of two huudred and forty men of our five companies who went into the fight, eighty or just one-third, were killed and wounded.

Of course, my personal observation of the assault terminated when I left the field. The fighting continued all day with more or less vigor. When it was discovered that the position could not be carried by assault, our men lay behind ridges, rocks and bushes, picking off occasional heads that rose above the parapet; and it was not until night that the scattered regiments were withdrawn. Our loss in killed and wounded in this fruitless assault was full twelve hundred; that of the rebels, trifling; although Bank's lookout, who surveyed the fight from the top of a high tree, declared that the enemy were very busy with their stretchers inside.

When the surgeon examined my wound with the probe, he pronounced it serious. "I can only bandage it now," he said; which he did, and left me. He has since told me that he supposed the ball had traversed the body, and that the wound was necessarily mortal. I read almost as much in his face, at the time; and still, I suffered little pain, and did not feel at all like a mortally-wounded man. The examination of three surgeons, the following day, showed another phrase of the story. The missile which had struck me was a buck shot; a rifle-ball in the same place would have laid me dead. It had been stopped in its course by a rib; and following the rib around the body, it had lodged in the integument, where I can feel it very plainly, at this writing.

"It lies too deep to be taken out," Doctor B.——decided. "Take it home with you, as a remembrance of Port Hudson."

The next day, General Weitzel called to see us; and, after sympathizing with us over our hurts, he began to talk about the assault. "You did all you could do," he said, "and I am well satisfied with the command. General Grover wanted to try it again, at another point; but I thought it was useless to make make another attempt the same day."

On the 16th, being pronouced able to travel, I was taken with an ambulance-load down to Springfield Landing, and thence shipped to New Orleans. This was my last experience before Port Hudson. When last I saw it, it was from the deck of the steamer Madison, in April, 1864, as I ascended the river to join Banks' Red River army at Alexandria. The stars and stripes were flying from the tall yellow cliffs, and the river itself teemed with busy life; for Vicksburg and Port Hudson had gone down together, and the Mississippi ran "unvexed to the sea." May its waters never more be crimsoned with the shedding of brothers' blood!

SONG.

BY CHARLES KINGSLEY.

The world goes up, and the world goes down,
And the sunshine follows the rain,
And yesterday's sneer and yesterday's frown
Can never come over again,
Sweet wife,
No, never come over again.

For woman is warm though man be cold,
And the night will hallow the day,
Till the heart which at even was weary and old
Can rise in the morning gay,
Sweet wife,
To its work in the morning gay.

SLEEPLESSNESS.

"Oh, that I could sleep!" How often is this prayer addressed to the night by the lonely watcher on the pillow! But just as sleep is courted, so does it seem to fly away; and at seasons which it is wanted the most, as in times of sorrow and suffering, sleep becomes more and more fitful, disturbed, and unfrequent. The happy child sleeps, so does the happy man or woman, full of physical health. Sleeplessness comes with thought, care, trials; the highly-cultivated and civilized being sleeps nothing like so soundly as the untutored hind or the rude savage. The thinking man's dreams are thoughtful. His animal being has become merged in the intellectual. His nervous system is in a state of high tension, asleep and awake; and it becomes a question to him of the highest interest, "How can I fall asleep?" As a general rule, all mental exertion should be avoided in the evening hours; and strong tea, especially green tea, ought to be eschewed. The latter has an extraordinary power of prolonging sleeplessness, more than any drug we know of. The perusal of a book late in the evening, requiring active thought to keep us with it, will induce wakefulness in excitable brains for many hours, after going to rest. In such cases, only light literature ought to be indulged in. Exciting conversation, or exciting music, have also the effect of keeping the brain active for many hours, and therefore, it is better to avoid these late at night, if you would sleep soundly. Various recipes have been given for inducing sleep, of which the most usual are those inducing monotony, such as repeating certain lines of poetry, counting a certain number of figures, and so on. Franklin, when sleepless, took an air bath—that is, he walked undressed about his chamber. Sermons have been found very effectual, but these cannot be conveniently administered at bedtime.

MONEY.

Precious metals as money are older than history. Two thousand years before Christ, Abraham, the Chaldean shepherd, whose children have never lost his faith, nor his thrift, though a hundred and fourteen generations, returned from Egypt, "very rich in cattle, in silver and gold." Afterwards, says the biblical record, he bought the cave of Machpelah—where his bones were to rest beside those of Sarah, the wife of his youth—for "four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant." The Catholic version has it "common, current money." The shekel was about sixty cents of our gold. It was weighed, not counted, for there were no mints in those days.

Herodotus asserts that coinage originated with the Lydians. The world's coins since, have been like leaves of Autumn. Most are extinct, but the British Museum preserves more than one hundred and twenty thousand varieties. The Paris collection is still greater, and is increased by two or three thousand every year. Our country has no large public accumulation, but the cabinet of the Philadelphia Mint contains many worth studying. Its medallion memorials of Washington number 216; but not one representing him in battle. It embraces many antique specimens. Here are the self-same coins which pious ancients placed between the cold lips of their dead to pay old Charon for ferriage over the Styx. Here is the very image and superscription of Cæsar which the Judea carpenter pointed out to the fishermen and tent-makers following him. Here are faces of rulers and captains down to our own day from Alexander of Macedon, and the mighties Julius who bestrode this narrow world like a Colossus.

"We see," says Swift, in one of his most sarcastic moods, "What God thinks of riches by the people he gives them to."

STRANDED.

Heavy and white hangs the fog to-night
Along the Jersey shore;
The air is chill, and all sounds are still,
Save the breakers' sullen roar,
And the shelving sands as they slip and slide
From the brown sea-beach with the outward tide.

The sea runs high; but above in the sky
Is the moon, all wan and white
As the face of a ghost; and along the coast,
In the dim uncertain light,
Spectral and grand the tall bluffs stand,
Gazing oceanward from the land.

Close at their feet where the wild waves meet
With a sullen, angry roar,
Mingling their spume in a sheet of fume
When the tide rolls in toward the shore,
Are the rocks dimly seen through the vapory screen,
As a puff of wind parts the fog between.

What if to-night in this treacherous light
A vessel in-shore should sail?
What if the strand on some reef of sand,
And the wind should grow to a gale?
Little chance to her fate, for the tide rises late,
And six long hours she would have to wait.

Hark to the gun! now another one,
And yonder, she ahead,
On Mariner's Shoal, where the breakers roll,
Those signal-lights burn red;
'Tis a ship aground, some "homeward bound,"
With the boiling surf and the fog all round.

Now the wind, that was still, blows fresh and chill,
And the white fog flies before;
And through cloudy rifts, as the dense mass lifts,
Shine the lanterns on the shore,
Where the wreckers stand, and with ready hand
Guide the crowded boats as they struggle to land.

Far voices call, and the moon over all
Reveals the stranded ship;
And her lights, as they blaze thro' the reddening haze,
With a sudden movement dip,
As the low ebb-tide leaves the beach bare and wide,
And her hull careens to the landward side.

Now the gray dawn breaks as the red sun wakes
In a leaden-colored sky;
One body found of four that were drowned,
And the ship still high and dry;
One star dim and pale, and a vanishing sail,
With the wind in-shore and blowing a gale.

THE PROGRESS OF TIME.—What a blessed order of nature it is that the footsteps of time are inaudible and noiseless, and that the seasons of life, like those of the year are so blended, the one with the other, that the human being scarcely knows, except from a faint, and not an unpleasant sensation, that he is growing old! So day steals into night through the crimson curtains of twilight. So the golden gates of dawn swing round noiseless as the portals of heaven. Even noiseless as the portals of heaven. Even the beat of the heart is muffled that we may not know how fast it struggles out. From the building of the ark to the rolling of the world there is no click of the machinery. There is no noise save of helpless waves, or the rent air groaning with the lightning's bolt, or now and then the play of a volcano's valves, or the puny cries of insects or of men, in all this world of ours. The past is dumb, the future silent, and the present makes but a slight ripple, like the trailing of a steamer on a quiet sea.

WHAT MRS. ELLIS SAID TO THE GIRLS.—My pretty little dears you are no more fit for matrimony than a pullet is to look after a family of fourteen chickens. The truth is, my girls, you want, generally speaking, more liberty and less parlor; more exercise and less sofas; more making puddings and less piano; more frankness and less mock modesty. I like a buxom, bright-eyed, rosy-cheeked, bouncing lass, who can darn stockings, make her own frock, mend trousers, command a regiment of pots, and shoot a wild duck as well as the Duke of Marlboro or the Queen of Spain; and be a lady withal in the drawing-room. But as for pining, moping, screwed-up, wasp-waisted, putty-faced, music-murdering, novel devouring daughters of fashion and idleness, with your consumption-soled shoes, and silk stockings, you won't do for wives and mothers.

RUFUS CHOATE, in maintaining the worthlessness of certain testimony offered upon the other side, in a case in which he was engaged, once said: "It would be as difficult to find a grain of truth in that testimony as to find a drop of water spilled in the Deseret of Sahara in the times of the Crusades!"

A FRENCH author, speaking of the quickness and brilliant genius of the English, says that, in writing letters, the men, on any one subject, will fill pages; but, to the praise of the women, be it spoken, they will write the same number of pages on no subject at all!

IF the proper way of spelling tho is "though," ate "eight," and bo "beaux," the proper way of spelling potatoes must be "poughteighteaux."

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

SPIRITISM, MORMONISN, AND OTHER "AMERICAN ISMS."

A RECENT number of the London Quarterly Review contains an able and interesting article, entitled "New American Religions," Perfectionism, Mormonism, Spiritism, and a number of the other eccentric forms, in which the religious sentiment has developed itself in the United States, are discussed with a considerable share of originality, though, as many will think, without profonud insight, or any accurate knowledge of the phases of American character and society touched upon. The social condition of the United States reminds the writer of the time when "there was no King in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes;" and at the time of the breaking out of the war, there was "the most open proclamation and the most bare-faced examples of the doctrine of universal license." And these repellant forces are not only in action all through the body politic, but they "work with especial force at the very center of social life, and the cry for freedom is heard even from the bosom of the family."

DEGENERACY OF AMERICAN WOMEN.

Approaching the question of "women's rights," the reviewer says: "Violent claims of right and assertions, of strength often spring from a consciousness of wrong and weakness. Observers of American society have detected even in the Nnrth something of that degeneracy in the best elements of female character which is so conspicuous in the Spanish races of the center and the South. Beneath the grace and beauty of the lady, we miss the more sterling qualities of the woman; and one of their own writers testifies that 'the American lady has not made an American home.' May not a certain want of apitude for, and of success in, home duties, be one unconscious motive of the claim to an equal share in the public life and the common rights of men? The English ideal of the sacred ministry of women in the temple of her home, where her gentle rule is felt in proportion as it is not asserted, and whence she goes forth to adorn aud influence society all the more, because she does not profess to govern it, is doubtless realized in many a happy household beyond the Atlantic; but those who seek it must look rather to the Western wilds than to the intellectual East and the luxurious South.

"Our purpose calls us to pictures less attractive to an English eye. Among ourselves there is a certain jealousy of all congresses; and, in particular, the Association for the advancement of Social Science has still to survive the ridicule which its scientific sister has lived down. Still even ladies begin to meet for objects of beneficence which seem to lie peculiarly within their sphere of action. Such quiet and unselfish gatherings, however, would hardly prepare us for the twenty-two resolutions passed at the first female congress in Ohio, introduced by a preamble which founded the claims of women on the Declaration of Independence. This was followed by the first 'National Woman's Rights Convention,' at Worcester, in Massachusetts, the object of which was described by its President, Pauline Davis, as 'an epochal movement, the emancipation of a class, the redemption of half the world, the re-organization of all social, political, and industrial interests and institutions. 'This' said she, 'is the age of peace, and woman is its sign'—a strange manifesto with which to begin a war that must rage within the bosom of every family! The resolutions passed at this convention claimed the suffrage for 'every human being of full age, who has to obey the law, and who is taxed for the support of the Government;' an equality of political rights so complete that 'the word male should be struck out of all our State constitutions,' and a revision of the laws of property as affecting married persons—this being a question which, doubtless, needs consideration on both sides of the Atlantic;—a better education for women, a fair partnership with men in trade and adventnre, and a share in the administration of justice. Still there are many in whom (shall we say?) 'the old Eve' is still alive, and the answer of one of these married ladies to Mr. Dixon is worth magazines-full of argument. To the inquiry, 'Are you a member of the Society for promoting equal rights as between the two sexes?' 'Certainly not,' she replied, with a quick shrug of the shonlders. 'Why not?' I ventnre to say, pursuing my inquiry. 'Oh!' she answered, with a sly little laugh, 'you see I am very fond of being taken care of.'"

WOMAN'S SUPERIORITY TO MAN.

The reviewer then takes up the peculiar views of Mrs. Eliza Farnham, which he numbers among the "New American Religions," and speaks of as though he supposed they were widely spread and had a large body of adherents. He says: "But these American 'ladies' are not contented with equality, they claim superiority over man, as a strictly logical consequence of the more complex organization of woman's nature. The discoverer of this profonnd mystery was a poor unlettered girl, to whom the truth came by revelation, in the year 1842. Credentials she had none to offer; the truth is its own witness. Bnt surely the truth, which came to Eliza Farnham by intuition and experience, can be made to us a matter of conviction. The very asking such a thing is a sign of our inferior nature.

'Eliza proudly contended, that although her Truth of Woman is new and strange, it admits of proof convincing to the female mind. As to the masculine mind, a thing of lower grade, she was not concerned about its ways. A Virginian never thought of arguing with his slave.'—Dixon, vol. ii, p. 201.

"Far from condescending to convince vain man of her superiority, she proves his inferiority, from the fact that 'he has been using his reason for ages past, without having fallen on this central truth.' The highest genius of man has failed in its delineation of female character: 'Shakspeare says nothing of woman that is to her credit or to his own;' and Milton's Eve has the fatal defect of following the Scripture story of the fall, the man's version, for which she substituted her own:

"In this new version of the Fall, Eve is not weak, but strong. She finds Adam in bonds, and she sets him free. He is bound by a bad law to live in a state of darkness and bondage, a mere animal life, without knowing good from evil. She breaks his fetters, and shows him the way to Heaven. The consequences of her act are noble; and through her courage Man did not fall, but rise. She did 'a great service to humanity,' when she plucked the forbidden fruit.

"In the details of the Fall, Eliza finds much comfort, when she can read them by her own inward light. Wisdom (in the form of a serpent) addressed the woman, not the man, who would have cared little for the tree of knowledge. The temptation offered to her was spiritual. She took the forbidden fruit, in the hope of becoming wiser and deviner than she had been. Man followed her. Yes, the ascendancy of woman began in Paradise!"—vol. ii, p. 207.

SPIRITISM.

Of the faith and practices of the American Spiritists, the writer speaks with undisguised abhorrence and contempt. He quotes, as something quite revolting, portions of the speeches of a Mr. Perry and a Mr. Finney, at the "First National Convention of Spiritualists," at Chicago, in 1864. But the Cleveland Convention of September, 1867, which had not met at the time when the article in the Quarterly was published) would have furnished him much more striking materal than any that he seems to have found in the proceedings of the first. Unless the phonographic report of the speeches of the Cleveland assembly, published in the New York Herald, is full of gross misrepresentations, the members of that body conducted themselves like a convention made up in about equal proportions of raving lunatics, hypocritical impostors, licentious profligates, and silly dupes. "Bro. William B. Potter," a medium, is thus reported to have addressed his fellow believers, on the day preceding the adjournment of the convention: "How long will you allow hypocrites, libertines and free lovers to hold leading and honorable positions as mediums, speakers, writers and officers to the deadly injury and burning shame of pure and orderly Spiritualism? Why will you accord full fellowship and honorable position to notorious and persistent libertines? Will you quietly hold your peace while artful free lovers perambulate the country, using their own psychological powers and every possible device which their ingenuity, stimulated by hellish passions and aided by 'low spirits,' can invent to break up families, seduce the young and innocent, and drag them down to the lowest forms of animalism? While healing mediums are practising promiscuous sexual relations for the cure of diseases; while abortionists abound in your ranks; while virtuous women are constantly liable to insult among Spiritualists; while thousands of good mediums are ashamed to go to circles, meetings and conventions; while multitudes of believers stand aloof, refusing to be identified with the folly and fraud, looseness and licenticusness so common in Spiritualism, can you, will you, dare you, in the sight of Heaven and in spite of the tears and sighs of deserted wives, seduce maidens and worse than orphan children, keep silent and allow hypocritical imposters, libertines and free lovers to stifle all discussion of those monstrous evils, even refusing to have read in your convention, or published in your papers a proposition to disfellowship the persistently immoral and licentious?"

THE MORMON POWER.

But the most striking portion of the picture of the social and religious novelties of America, which the English reviewer has undertaken to sketch, is occupied with a figure that "towers above the rest, like Milton's fallen archangel among the powers of darkness; a new religion which boasts its new Bible, a prophet who has been likened to Mohammed, a migration not unworthy to be called an exodus, a church which, amidst a remote wilderness, is growing to the dimensions of a State, and influencing the politics of America; while its missionaries are gathering converts and emigrants from every quarter of the world; and this social phenomenon, however vast and important in itself, is moreover connected with the future destiny of religions which surpass the old States in magnitude as much as these surpass the mother-country. The one region of the vast West, which Nature seemed to have marked out from the rest as unfit for human habitation, is the elevated plateau cutoff by the Rocky Mountains on the east from the plains watered by the Nebraska and the Kansas, and by the Sierra Nevada on the west from the Pacific seaboard, and divided by other ranges on the north and south from the basins of the Columbia and the Colorado; where the land, whitened by an alkaline crust, bears little vegetation bnt the sage brush; where the rivers, severed from the sea, are either lost in the arid soil or from lakes of intense saltness. Yet this is the region which the Mormons deliberately chose as their refuge from persecution; and, retiring into the desert, like the chosen people whose forms and names they affect, they found a new Jordan running into its own Salt Lake, traced out their New Jerusalem on its banks, organized within the territory of the United States a republic of their own under a despotic chief and prophet, changed the received order of domestic life, and by marvelous industry raised abundant crops where an old trapper promised to give a thousand dollars for every ear of corn that should be grown! It would need the wealth of California to redeem his promise now! The valleys of this region have been peopled in twenty years by 150,000 souls, and fresh trains, not of emigrants only, but of pilgrims converted to the new faith from every quarter of the world, flock annually to the new Zion.

"Are the doctrines tanght and the deeds performed within that city the germ of a new religion which shall redeem the world, or are they worthy of the ancient cities of the plain? Or, rejecting these extreme views, shall we pronounce Mormonism a sincere illusion, bearing some good with some evil fruit, or a gross deception sprnng from ambition and greed of gain, and cheating its dupes with a brief taste of temporal good? What is the secret of its rapid spread? What the lure that attracts votaries from every nation?"

Of the cnntroversial skill of the Mormon missionaries, the reviewer says: "Any educated person who thinks that Mormon missionaries may be successfully met by snch an answer to their arguments as would be acceptable to the middle classes of England, profoundly mistakes the natnre of the art of making proselytes among the poor and ignorant. Persnasion among the Mormon converts depends not so much on absolute argnment, for in such cases one argument is, in fact, as good as another, but on a sufficiently ready and shallow controversial dexterity, aided by personal influence, ready flattery, actual help and kindness, and the promise of material advantage to the convert. One thing is essestial to the Mormon controversialist, to be able to give some sort of answer to any objections; and this art at least he had thoroughly learnt. Of the shifts by which the Mormon meets the attacks of Gentile objectors to his faith, Captain Burton's remarkable account of Mornmanism gives a series of examples well worthy of attention as contributions to the general theory of religions controversy."

MISCELLANY.

ARTHUR SKETCHLEY, the humorist is about to visit the United States. In appearance he is the very beau ideal of an Englishman of the present day. He wears a moustache, imperial, long side-whiskers, and parts his hair in the middle. He affects handsome vests and showy scarf-rings. But with all his hair and his airs, at one glance you may see that Arthur Sketckley is a man of no ordinary intellect. Any one who reads his "Brown Papers," republished from Fun, will have no doubt of it. They attracted unusual attention for their broad rich humor, on their first appearance in the pages of the new London comic paper. The same author has happily chronicled the experiences of the same heroine, Mrs. Brown, in her recent "Visit to the Paris Exhibition."

GOOD-NIGHT.

Good night, good night—
How many a thought this simple phrase,
The heart, by tell-tale tone, conveys;
How swells its inmost depths to hear,
From those we hold in friendship dear,
The cheerful words, "Good night."

'Neath moonbeams bright
The lovers linger hand-in-hand,
Speaking the tongue hearts understand,
Dreading the hour that draws so near,
When sweetly, sadly, to the ear,
Comes those fond words, "Good Night."

With true delight
The willing form of childhood sleeps,
And age, its cheerful vigil keeps,
While lingers devoutly on the ear,
Those words to youth and age so dear—
Those earnest words, "Good night."

Good night, good night—
The promise of another day
Its cheerful, honest tones convey;
'Tis no long parting that we fear,
But sign of promise when we hear
That welcome phrase, "Good night!"

GOING A CLAMMING AT HIGH WATER.

A STORY WITH A MORAL.

At the early age of fifteen, I received a practical lesson in the world's experience, that lasted through many years and still remains deeply engraven on the tablets of my memory.

Saturday was to be a whole day, instead of half a day as usual. That is to say, we usually had a half-day's school Saturday, but upon this occasion, the funernal of the "oldest inhabitant," we were allowed a whole day. I was immoderately fond of clams, as an article of food, and upon a retrospective view, I could not call to mind the time when I had had a sufficiency at any one sitting; and so I had determined that when I got old enough, I would just go for myself—dig for myself—roast them on the smooth rocks, eat all I wanted, and carry home enough for all hands, and especially the cook.

It was five miles down the river to the clam-beds, as related to me by the boys who used to bring them to market, and "pooty long miles too," they sometimes added.

My spirit thirsted for adventure, and my stomach called out for clams; and so I was up before the sun and manning father's skiff myself, sat down to the task of rowing five miles down the river, and long miles they proved.

I was quite unused to rowing cross-handed, and made an awkward hand of it, and slow progress. Every ten minutes I had to rest on my oars, while I used the bailing dish, an old tin pan that leaked like a seive. At such times I found the boat making rapid progress in the wrong way. The tide was ahead. I had never thought of tide. I was so much engaged by the prospect of digging for clams. And now I found it would not do to stop so long to bail, in the midst of the current; and so I tugged on till the water would be halfway up to my knees, and then by plumping her nose on to the shore, I would free her and then tug on, till after many hours of hard toil, and by dint of my ambitious craving for adventure, I finally arrived at the Cove, rather before high-water.

Old skipper Wright and his son John, had spied me, and and went down to the shore to see what water-logged craft was approaching,

"Hullo," says he, "you're Jones' little boy, ain't yer."

"Little boy," thought I. "I guess he don't know I'm fifteen."

"What did the old man send you down here, against a flood tide, in such a leaky old punt as that for?"

I told him I came a clamming.

"Haw, haw, haw! and te—he—ee! went the twain. "It ain't full sea yet, and then it will be six hours ebb, before clam time, You can play round here with Johnny, till dinner's ready, and then after you've taken cargo enough to strengthen your hull, you can pull back and get home before sundown. Meantime I'll set things to right; make you a new thowl pin, and stuff some oakum into the seams, for she leaks like a sponge."

Johnny and I played around for an hour or more, and when the old conch-shell was blowed, we went to a substantial dinner.

"Now," said the ancient mariner, "you needn't be in no hurry; let's see, my boy is about your age, thirteen."

"I'm fifteen since last February, and now 'tis March," said I rather sharply.

The skipper winked one eye at his old woman, as he stood kneading his tobacco into a wad for his after-dinner pipe.

Well, John and I, scoured the beach pretty well; picked up shells, scaled stones, went to see the whale's carcase, and get some long pieces of kelp.

After 2 o'clock, P. M., I went to the boat accompanied by father and son, sat down to my oars and shoved off. I hadn't got well under way, before the skipper hailed me with "Look-a-here, young man, how old did I understand you to say you was?"

"Fifteen," answered I, lying on my oars.

"Wall," said he, "if you live forty years more, you'll be as old as I am now, and I want to tell you something that may do you good. That is, never go a clamming at high-water."

Fourteen years after that, I met with father and son at Trieste. The son was master of a fine new barque, 700 tons. The old skipper said he had come out on a little voyage in the John to see how the little craft behaved herself, rough or smooth. I remarked upon how well his son had done in the world; that he was a smart boy, and had fulfilled the promise of his youth.

"Yes," said he, "John went a clamming at low water, and has been rowing up river with a fair tide ever since; and I rather guess, you've paid some heed to what an old man said to you once, or you wouldn't be skipper of that snug brig that lays there—everything taught, in ship-shape and Bristol fasbion, low and aloft."

It is many years now since I received this well-meant admonition, not to go a clamming at high-water, and I have never forgotten the well intended advice. I have sometimes, myself, often unavoidably, been caught in this dilemma. Three-fourths of the people in the world, as I have observed, invariably "go a clamming at high-water." Copper stocks, railroad shares, silver mines and other bubbles, have been coming up steadily and rapidily and with a rush. Green-horn has been watching for an opportunity to make a profitable investment. Bog mountain has risen from 3 1-2 to 65, and good judges (those who have it for sale), say it will reach, or exceed par. It goes up to 70, and Mr. G. goes in. Next day it is 71. "Hold on," say his friends, the brokers. A week after, 35 only is bid! Another week, by George! the bubble bursts, and young G.'s patrimony is gone, and he bangs himself in the warehouse. So much for going a clamming at high water!

My old friend, Capt. P. had retired from the sea with a comfortable pile. He had a beautiful situation by the-seashore, overlooking a broad bay, and a large extent of ocean. There was a snug cottage and convenient out-buildings upon the place, and a nice wharf, where be moored his yacht. P. was a bachelor, but when he concluded to cast anchor, be cast about in his mind the propriety of shipping a chief mate for life, and was recommended by a friend to a family where there were five or six marriageable daughters. The captain dreaded the operation worse than ever he dreaded doubling Cape Horn, as he told me, and wished this part of the business could be left to a shipping master. But be was obliged to look the wind in the eye and stand on, breakers or no breakers. When he had once got the ice broke there was no further difficulty. The eldest, somewhat on the steady side of thirty, had been set apart for him, by family arrangement. She was accomplished and well got up, and preserved, according to fashion and art. She sang and played well, and conversed and smiled, au regle. She became his wife. The captain took her on the top of the tide, and she has been ebbing ever since. One after another of the tools of her trade, by which she had enticed the unwary captain into the meshes of her net, were laid aside, as of no further use, since the prey had been secured. Her sweetest smiles were never put on, now, except for the benefit of company. She did not even care to dress well in her own family. The old seaman was disgusted and took to the sea again.

We met, as it so happened, several times in foreign ports. One evening, on board his ship at Valparaiso, he spoke freely of his domestic affairs, and of the unhappiness of bis life. "Casual," said he, "I thought I had got an angel, but it was the wrong kind. I thought that nature never formed a more beautiful woman; but, in the end, I found that it was art that got her up, instead of nature. There was nothing about her natural, except her evil disposition. She made no bones, after a while, of telling me she married me for my money."

I retorted by saying, that we were sailing on the same tack, then. Both must be disappointed.

"I thought she possessed every good quality when I married her, and found to my sorrow that everything about her was artificial, as easily laid off and put on her as her wig or false teeth, and a thousand other things."

"You thought," said I "that I had money for you to spend as you chose. I did have a good pile then, but it is out of your reach, except so far as affording you a reasonable support. My old ship is nearly ready, and I shall soon be out of your reach too. She called me some very pretty names and so we parted company and I have not been home since."

Ah, poor old friend and you, too, went a clamming at high-water.—Casual.

St. Charles Restaurant.—This new restaurant is presided over by Mme. Lazintre, being connected with the hotel of C. Gailland, Nos. 507 and 509 Pine street, just above Kearny. The result of several visits there, demonstrated the fact, that ladies predominate, and should some of our beaux and bachelors decide to make it a "stopping place," we guarentee a "feast of beauty"—to say nothing of the excellent meals served a la Francisco.

Laborious writing is characteristic of all the Boston authors. Holmes labors over a sentence till every word is wedded to its place, if it takes him a month to do it; and Lowell works the better part of three months on an article for the North American Review. Emerson's second volume of "Essays" was fifteen months in going through the press, and when it was done, the corrections cost more than the original composition. It is so also with Longfellow. Every one has heard of the coterie who sat up of nights over "Dante," and the proof-sheets of that work show that after it had passed that ordeal it was sadly interlined, and whole verses were altogether rewritten by the translator. By such rugged paths have these men scaled the flowery heights of Parnassus. Longfellow always sends to the printer very clear copy. His MS. is all written in lead pencil, upon sheets of good quality of book paper; each sheet contains never more than two four-line verses. The MS. copy of his translation of "Dante," if bound, would make several immense volumes.

We hear that in Paris a ladies' club has been finally established, and that all is going on as could be desired. Smoking is allowed, likewise cards and billiards, likewise strong drinks, and all classes of "light" reading, also knitting and crotchet; but another likewise has begun to trouble the secretary of the club, which is, likewise husbands. The majority are stoutly against such an innovation, and defend their views by the fact that gentlemen refuse their wives admission to their clubs, and, that if husbands are admitted, brothers, and even lovers would be proposed.

The Oak and the Ivy.—Ivy being prevented from attaching itself to the oak beyond a certain point, will shoot off into a bold elastic stem, with an air of as much independence as any branch of oak in the vicinity. So a human being, thrown, whether by cruelty, injustice, or accident, from all social support and kindness, if he has any vigor of spirit, and is not in the bodily debility of either childhood or age, will instantly begin to act for himself, with a resolution which will appear like a new faculty.

Large Sale of Oakland Property.—On Wednesday next, Mauraee, Dore & Co. will sell at Platt's Hall, 500 Villa Lots in the City of Oakland. This property is most desirably located, between Twentieth and Twenty-eighth streets, Oakland; commands a splendid view of the Bay and City of San Francisco and the Golden Gate, and adjoins the Market and Adeline Street Railroad Stations. Property in the vicinity is built on and well improved: the residences of James de Femery, Col. A. J Coffee, David Barstow, and others adjoining it. Every one knows that Oakland and Oakland property is improving wonderfully. This sale will afford a splendid opportunity for investment. The terms of sale are most liberal, namely: one fourth cash and the balance at long credit at eight per cent. annual interest.

Occidental Restaurant.—This favorite, resort of good livers is now under the sole maugement of Mr. George Wittman, he having bought out the interest of his former partner. This restaurant has always maintained an excellent reputation, and "George," who is somewhat noted for liberal catering, has inaugurated some improvements since he has assumed sole proprietorship which have made the Occidental a "model restaurant" indeed. Perhaps, for the benefit of straugers, is as well to add that the "Occidental" is located at 536 Washingtou street, a few doors below Montgomery.

Friends of the Late Mrs. Hannah S. Andrews, who loved and esteemed her while living, can testify the love they bear her memory by continuing their patrouage to the institution, to sustain which, she so intelligently and assiduously devoted so many years of life. In her substitute, they will find a lady eminently deserving their support, who is intelligent, cautious, active, kind, and not only willing, but anxious to learn from their own experience the ways of her predecessor; while she is also aided by Dr. Bourne's advice, No. 10 Masonic Temple.

Belden's Restaurant.—Mr. F C. Belden, so well known as the proprietor of the depot of family luxuries, at No. 652 Sacramento street, has entered in the business of catering for bachelors, as well as families, and has opened a first class restaurant on the corner of Spring and Summer streets, opposite the California Market, where he is prepared to supply all the wants of "good livers," in his peculiar superior style. The choice articles contained in his depot of family luxuries—which can be found gracefully enumerated in rhyme in our advertising columns—will be largely drawn on to give peculiar zest to Belden's Restaurant fare.

Oysters and Clams.—Wm. Roalfe, Nos. 40, 41, and 42, California Market, entrance on California street, keeps on hand, from 6 A.M. until 5 P. M., and Saturday nights until 10 P. M., oysters and clams. Families supplied at the shortest notice with fresh oysters and clams. The deviled-crabs are to be had here and nowhere else. And for business men, on California street, there is no place where a better lunch can be served. Mr. Roalfe is well known to the community as a first class caterer. Call and leave your orders, wholesale or retail.

Carpets, Upholstery Goods, Wall Paper, etc., may be bought at the lowest figure at the new store of Joseph Fredericks, 123 Kearny, between Sutter und Post streets. Mr. Fredericks' stock is entirely fresh new, and bought at the present ruling reduction of prices.

Steam Baths for One Dollar, at Dr. Bourne's, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Notice is renewed that this is the only establishment which excludes all loathsome diseases and improper persons. *

Cures Guaranteed to the Sick in almost all cases, without medicines, bleeding, blistering, or plastering—quick and pleasant—by Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Reasonable charges for positive benefits. *

OLD STORIES RETOLD—NELSON AT TRAFALGAR.

NELSON, although only forty-six years of age, was already a shattered man. Fragile, thin, and sickly, weakened by ague in childhood, beaten down by fever in the East Indies, almost killed by dysentery at Honduras, always sick at sea, an eye lost at Corsica, an arm at Cadiz, cut about the head at the battle of the Nile, struck in the side in another engagement, his cough dangerous, he scarcely hoped to fight more than one more battle. Yet his heart was sound as ever, and the unquenchable lion spirit glowed within him, in spite of all.

At Portsmouth, Nelson learned that Sir Robert Cadler had fallen in with the French fleet off Finisterre, and had only scratched them when he ongbt to bave run his cutlass through their hearts. The Victory nuloaded. Nelson, embowered down at ever pleasant Merton, making bay, watching sheep, catching trout in the winding Wandle, idolizing Lady Hamilton, that beautiful but wanton woman, forgot ambition, and grew more intent on rick awnings than French canvas. One daybreak, Captain Blackwood brought word that the Frencb had refitted at Vigo and got into Cadiz. Nelson paced "the quarter-deck" walk in bis garden restlessly. He pretended to be indifferent, and quoted a playful proverb: "Let the man trudge it, who's lost bis bndget." He was happy, and his healtb was better. "He wouldn't give sixpence to call the king his uncle." Lady Hamilton knew tbe beart of the brave man she loved, and pressed him to go. The French fleet was his property; it was the reward of his two years watching. He wonld be miserable if any one else had it. "Nelson, offer yonr services." The tears came into his eyes at her heroism. At half past ten that night be started in a post chaise for London. His diary for tbat day lays bare his heart before us.

"Friday night (Sept. 13) at half-past ten," he says, "I drove from dear, dear Merton; where I left all whicb I bold dear in this world, to go to serve my king and conntry. May the great God, whom I adore, enable me to fulfill the expectatious of my country! and, if it is his good pleasure that I should return, my thanks will never cease being offered up to the throne of his mercy. If it is bis good providence to cut short my days upon earth. I bow with the greatest submission; relying that he will protect those so dear to me, whom I may leave behind! His will be done. Amen! Amen! Amen!"

The probability of his death had entered his mind, that is evident; presentiments are never anything, after all, but snch probabilities.

The embarkation of Nelson at Portsmouth was a scene wortby of Grecian history. Althnngh he tried to steal secretly to his sbip, crowds collected, eager to see the face of the hero they venerated. Many of the rugged sailors were in tears; old men-of-war's men knelt and prayed God to bless bim as he passed to the boat. They knew he was the sailor's friend and tbe orphan's father; they knew him to be as humane as he was fearless, unselfish, and eager to pour out his blood for England. No basely-earned money had defiled his hands; his heart was pnre crystal; it had no flaw. As Southey says finely, "Nelson had served his conntry with all his heart, with all his sonl, and with all bis strength, and therefore they loved him as truly and fervently as he bad loved England." That one-eyed, one-armed, shrunken invalid officer was still the tower and bulwark of his native land.

On arriving at Cadiz, Nelson took an old sportsman's precantions not to flurry the game he had been so long stalking. The French wanted encouraging. They were shy. Nelson kept his arrival as secret as possible. The Gibralter Gazette did not publish tbe nnmber of his vessels. He kept fifty miles to the west of Cadiz, near Cape St. Mary; for it has been often observed, "rats won't bolt when terriers are too near the holes." He instantly seized all the Danish vessels carrying provisions to Cadiz for the French fleet. His final stratagem was the bait that at last drew forth tbe enemy. He detached some vessels on an imaginary service, knowing that fresh ships were almost daily arriving for him from England. This brought out Villeneuve at last, although he had just declared in a council of war that he would not stir from Cadiz till his fleet was one-tbird stronger than tbe Engilsh.

On the 9th, Nelson bad written to his favorite officer, the brave and simple-hearted Colliogwood, enclosing his plan of attack, wishing to give full scope to bis captain's judgment in carrying ont his intentions.

"My dear Coll," he said, in his hearty way, "we can have no little jealousies. We have ooly one great object in view, that of annihilating our enemies, and getting a glorions peace for ourcountry. No mao has more confidence in another than I have in you; and no man will render your sevices more justice than your very old friend, NELSON AND BRONTE."

The order of attack was grand in its simplicity. The true sea-warrior instinct and experieoce had struck out a plan as admirable as if it had been forged in the brain of Newton. The fleet was to move in two lines, and like two swift sword-fish pierce into the enemy: it was to be proceeded by an advanced squadron of eight of the swiftest two-deckers. Collingwood was to chop the enemy in two about the twelfth vertebra from tbe tail ship. Nelson himself was to give the coup de grace at the centre—the heart—whilst the advanced squadron was to cut off abont three or four from wherc he would break through. In this way the assailants would always be one-fourth superior to those portions they broke off. There was professional genius in tbese well-aimed blows.

Nothing was sham, mysterions, nor inflated about his directions. His "precise object" was a close and decisive action; therefore, "if signals were not seen or clearly understood, no captain would do wrong," he said, "if he placed bis ship alongside that of an enemy." One of his last orders was that tbe name and family of every man killed or wounded in the action should be, as soon as possible, returned to him, to transmit to the Patriotic Fund.

Abont balf-past nine on the morning of the 19th, the Mars, the nearest of the line of scouting ships, repeated the signal that the enemy was at last stealiug out of port. The wind was light, with partial breezes. About two, the repeatiug ships announced the French fleet at sea. The next day, seeing nothing, and the wind blowiug fresh from the southwest, Nelson began to fear the French had run back to shelter. A little before sunset, bowever, Blackwood, in the Euryalus, reported that the Freuch were still pressing westward, and that way Nelson bad determiued they should not go but over bis sunken fleet. Still, however, thinking they were inclined to run for Cadiz, Nelson kept warily off that nigbt.

At daybreak, the Freuch fleet of thirty-three sail of the line, and seven large frigates formed a crescent, in close line of battle, off Cape Trafalgar, near the southernmost point of Andalusia. They were ou the starboard tack, and twelve miles to leeward, and standiug to the south. Eighteen of the enemy were Freuch, and fifteen Spanish. Nelson had twenty-seven sail of the line, and four frigates. Tbe French vessels werc larger and heavier than ours, and they had on board four thousand skilled troops, and many dreaded and extremely skillful Tyrolese rifiemeu.

Soon after daylight, Nelson was on deck, eagerly eyeing tbe Freuch crescent. He had on his admiral's frock-coat—bis "fighting coat," as he called it—which he had worn in many victories; but he did not put on the sword which his uncle, Captain Suckling, had used, wben, on that very day many years before he had beaten off a French squadrou. Nelson had wished this day to be the day of battle, and had even balf superstitionsly expected the coincidence. He wore, as usual, on his left breast, four stars of various orders of knighthood, one of tbem being the Order of the Bath, which he specially valued as the personal and free gift of the king. Dr. Scott, the chaplaiu, Mr. Scott, Lord Nelson's public secretary, and Mr. Beatty, the surgeon, remonstrated when he thus made himself a conspicuous mark for the euemy by these decorations. "In honor," he had exclaimed on a former similar occasion, "I gained them (the orders), and in honor, I will die with tbem."

The blue liquid battle plan was ready for tbe fight. Tbere was no need of digging graves in that vast cemetary. Enrope and Africa were watching the combatants. Already the shot was plied, and the powder passed up from the magazines. The sailors stood at their guns. The men that in balf an hour would be stretched dead and mangled on tbe red and splintered planks, were bussy getting their tompions and firebuckets and cartridges ready, or lashing cutlasses round the masts, ready to hand.

Nelson seldom began a battle without a prayer. He had always a profound sense of God's omnipotence and omniscience. He now retired to his cabin, and wrote a simple but fervid prayer. He now retired to his cabin, and wrote a simple but fervid prayer. He annexed to this prayer in his diary a sort of will—his lest reqnest to his country in case he fell, as he seems to have expected to do. It was headed: "October 21, 1865.—Then in sight of the combined fleets of France and Spain, distant abont ten miles."

Blackwood and Hardy were the witnessess.

The wind was now from the west, light breezes with a long heavy swell. Blackwood, who came on board the Victory at about six o'clock, found Nelson in good spirits, but grave and calm, and not in that glow and exultation which he had shown before Abourkir and Copenhagen. He had already expressed his belief that the French wonld make a dead set at the Victory. The French had now tacked to the northward, and, to Nelson's great regret, formed their line on the larboard tack, thereby bringing the shoals of Trafalgar and St. Pedro under the Britisb lee, and leaviug the port of Cadiz open for themselves. Nelson at once gave signal to prepare for anchor, and the necessity of this measure was strongly on his mind to the last. He told Blackwood to use the frigates as much as possible.

"I mean to-day," he said, "to bleed the captains of the frigates, as I shall keep you on board nntil the very last minute."

"During the five bours and a half," says Blackwood, "that I remained on board the Victory, in which I was not ten times from his side, he frequently asked me what I should consider as a victory. The certainty of which he never for an instant seemed to doubt, although from the situation of the land he questioned the possibility of the subsequent preservation of tbe prizes. My answer was, 'Tbat considering the handsome way in which the battle was offered to the enemy, tbeir apparent determination for a fair trial of strength, and the proximity of the land, I tbought if fonrteen ships were captured it would be a glorious result.' To which he always replied, 'I shall not, Blackwood, be satisfied with anything short of twenty.' A telegraphic signal had been made by him to denote that he intended to break through the rear of the enemy's line, to prevent their getting into Cadiz." "I was walking with him," continues the Captain Blackwood, "on the poop, when he said, 'I'll now arouse the fleet with a signal; and he asked me if I did not think there was one yet wanting. I answered tbat I thought the whole of the fleet seemed very clearly to understand what they were about, and to vie with each other who should first get nearest the Victory or Royal Sovereign. These words were scarcely uttered, when his last well-known signal was made, 'ENGLAND EXPECTS EVERY MAN WILL DO HIS DUTY.' The shout which followed was truly sublime."

There had been a good deal of paltry discussion as to wbether Nelson wrote or only modified this signal. It matters little; he sanctioned it, and it was that sanction alone that gave it immortality. The shout that welcomed it was like a roll of thunder, because the signal seemed like a voice from England and from home. It was an omen of victory.

About seven o'clock the French wore, and stood in a close line on the starboard tack towards Cadiz, the sun lull upon their sails, their three-deckers rising from the water like floating cities. About ten, Nelson became anxious to close with the enemy.

He went over the different decks, where the men stood grouped in eights round their favorite guns. He spoke to them in bis own kind and pleasant way, and saw that the preparations were eveywhere complete. As he ascended the quarter-deck ladder it was as if he asceuded to a throne, and the men greeted him with three cheers.

The French fleet, comanded by Admiral Villeneuve, in the Bucentaur, included Nelson's old antagonist, the Santissima Triuidada (of one hundred and forty guns,) two vessels of one hundred and twelve guns, one of one hundred, six of eighty-four and eighty, the rest being seventy-fours of a large class together with seven frigates of heavy metal, forty-four and forty guns each, besides other smaller vessels. The Spaniards were commanded by Admiral Gravina, who bad under him Vice-Admiral Don J. d'Aliva and rear-Admiral Don B. M. Cisneros. Villeneuve had under him Rear-Admirals Dumanoir and Moyon. Four thousand troops were embarked on board the fleet under the commaud of General Contarini in the Bucentaur, amongst whom were several of the most skillful sharpshooters that could be selected, and many Tyrolese riflemen. Various sorts of cumbustiles and fire-balls were also embarked. Tbe Spaniards appeared with their beads to the northward, and formed their line of battle with great closeness and correctuess; and as the mode of attack by Nelson was nnusual, so the structure of their line was new. It formed a crescent convexing to leeward, and Admiral Collingwood, in leading down to the centre, had both the van and rear of the enemy abaft his beam. Tbey were formed in a double line thus:

French and Spaniards alternately, and it was tbeir intention, on our breaking the line astern of No. 4, (which manœuvre they expected we should, as nsual, put into execution,) for No. 2 to make sail; that the British ship in hauling up should fall on board of her, whilst No 5 should bear up and take her, and No 1 briug her broadside to bear on her starboard bow. This manœuvre only succeeded with the Tonnant and Bellerophon, which were amongst the ships that suffered most. Before tbeir fire, therefore opened, every alternate sbip was about a cable's length to the windward of her second ahead and astern, formiog a kind of double line, and appeared when on tbeir beams, to leave a very little interval between them, and this without crowding their ships. Admiral Villeneuve was on board the Bucentaur eighty guns, in the centre, and the Prince of Asturias bore Gravina's flag in the rear.

Collingwood led onr lee line of thirteen ships. Nelson, the weaker line of fourteen. Nelson steered two points more to the nortb than Collingwood, in order to cut off tho enemy's retreat towards Cadiz. The lee line, therefore, was first engaged. Villeneuve was desperate; bo had resolved to fight against the wish of the Spaniards, partly because he thought that Nelson had not arrived, and because he knew that Napoleon, furious at his poor success with Sir Robert Calder, had already sent M. Rosely to supersede bim. His crews were in a feverish clamor of bragging excitement, every one shouting at the same time, as usual with a Gaul in moments of danger.

Nelson's eyes brigbtened with delight when he saw Collingwood, in the Royal Sovereign, go straight as an arrow at the centre of tbe enemy's line, chop it tbrough astern of the Santa Anna, a three-decker (112,) then open fire and engage the vessel at the muzzle of her guns on the starboard side.

"See!" be says, "see how that noble fellow, Collingwood, carries his ship into actiou."

Collingwood at the same moment looked back exultingly at the Victory, and said to his captain (Rotherham of the cocked hat,) "Rotherham, what would not Nelson give to be here?" Only tbe day before Nelson had reconciled Collingwood and Rotherham, saying, "Look! yonder are the eoemy, them shake hands."

At half-past eleven the French guns opened on the Royal Sovereign; as the Victory came sweeping down, the French ships abead of her, and across her bows, at fifty minutes past eleven began to try the distance; they fired single guns. Perceiving a shot pass througb the main-topgallantsail, tbey opened a feu d'enfer, chiefly, (as is their custom) at the rigging, to disable her before she could grapple. Nelson instantly ordered Blackwood and Captain Prowse, of the Sirins, to go on board their ships, and tell all the line-of-battle captains as they passed to disregard bis plan of action if in any other way they conld get quicker and closer alongside an euemy. "He then," Blackwood says, "agaiu desired me to go away; and as we were standing on the front of the poop, I took his hand and said, 'I trust, my lord, that ou my return to the Victory, which will be as soon as possible, I shall find your lordship well, and in possession of twenty prizes.' On which he made tbis reply: 'God bless you, Blackwood; I shall never speak to you again.'"

The two columns, led by their brave chiefs, continued to advance, with light airs, and all sails set, toward the van and centre of tbe enemy, whose line extended about north-north-east and south-southwest.

Nelson gave orders to hoist several flags on the Victory, for fear that a single one might be shot away. Tbe French, strangely enough, showed no colors till late in the action, when tbey required them as signals of striking. As usual, the English admiral had forbiddin musketry in the tops, as he considered it a paltry mode of homicide, which might kill a commander, but could not decide a battle.

He then ran straight on the bows of the Santissima Trinidada, a monstrous four-decker, the ninth ship in the van of the French double crescent line; the Victory opened on her with er larboard guns at four minutes past twelve.

Meanwhile, Collingwood, having poured a deadly dose of a broadside and a half (full measure) into the stern of the Santa Anna, had jammed into the French ship, so that the yards of the two vessles were locked together. His hands were soon full, for the Fougueux came malignantly on his lee quarter-and three more of the enemy's French ships soon bore on the bow of the Royal Sovereign. The Victory, silent and stern as if its crew were invulnerable, never fired a shot, but moved on, calm as fate, and irresistable as death, till fifty of her men were struck down, thirty wounded, and her main topmast, with all her studding-sails and booms shot away. Nelson said, that in all his battles, he had never seen men so cool and resolute as his. At length the simple word was given, and the Victory spoke at last, vomiting out spouts of fire, and belching her winged thunder to the right and to the left.

It was not possible to break the enemy's line without running onboard one of their ships; Hardy informed the admiral of this, and asked him which he would prefer. Nelson replied: "Take your choice, Hardy; it does not signify much." The master was ordered to put the helm to port, and the Victory ran on board the Redoubtable, just as her tiller-ropes were shot away. The French ship received her with a broadside; then instantly let down her lower deck ports, for fear of being boarded through them, and never afterward fired a gun during the action. Her tops, like those of all the enemy's ships, were filled with riflemen.

A few minutes after this proof of distrust, Captain Harvey, in the Temeraire, also fell on board the Redoubtable, and the Temeraire had also an enemy on her side, so that the four vessels now lay in a compact tier, their heads in one way as if in dock; but Nelson soon pounded her antagonist deaf and dumb, passed astern of the Bucentaur, hauled in on her starboard side, pouring in a slaughtering broadside in passing, then stood for that floating mountain, the Santissima, playing her larboard guns with incredible rapidity on both the Bucentaur and Santissima, while the starboard guns of her middle and lower decks were steadily devoted to that rather tough antagonist the Redoubtable. It became necessary for the Victory to fire at the Redoubtable with depressed guns, three shots each, and with reduced charges of powder, for fear of the shot passing the Frenchman and injuring the Temeraire. The guns of her lower-deck touched the Redoubtable's side; so, for fear of the Frenchman catching fire and destroying both vessels, the fireman of each gun stood ready with a bucket full of water, which he immediately dashed into the hole made by the English shot.

The Victory was fighting hard amid a ceaseless blaze of flame. Luckily, the French were not such good seamen as Nelson, and in consequence of keeping the wind nearly on their beam, lay in a deep trough of the sea, and rolled so heavily that their broadsides sometimes flew over and sometimes fell short of our ships. Still a raking fire swept the Victory's deck.

Mr. Scott, the admiral's secretary, was killed by one of the first cannon-balls, whilst in conversation with Captain Hardy, and near to Lord Nelson. Captain Adair, of the Marines, who soon afterwards fell, immediately endeavored to remove the mangled body, but it had already attracted the notice of the admiral.

"Is that poor Scott," said he, "who is gone?"

Presently, whilst Nelson was conversing with Captain Hardy on the quarter-deck, during the shower of musket balls and raking fire that was kept up by the enemy, a double-headed shot came across the poop and killed eight of the marines. Captain Adair was then directed by Nelson to disperse his men more round the ship. A few minutes afterwards a shot struck the fore-brace bits on the quarter-deck, and passing between Lord Nelson and Captain Hardy, drove some splinters from the bits around them, bruised Capt. Hardy's foot, and tore off his shoe-buckle. They mutually looked at each other, and Nelson, whom no danger could affect, smiled and sailed:

"This is too warm work, Hardy, to last!"

This was the climax of the battle. Our brawny sailors stripped to the waist, their huge cable pigtails dangling at their backs, their skins black with powder, or smeared with blood, were running out the guns, loading savagely, and firing as fast as the wadded shot could be driven in. The captains were bellowing through their speaking-trumpets, the gunner's boys running to and from the magazines through showers of shot and splinters; the midshipmen firing at the enemy's tops with all the glee of schoolboys cut at their first partridge-shooting. The musketeers in the Redoubtable's tops fired especially sharply whenever the smoke-cloud rolled away from the Victory, and there came a glint of the epaulettes of our officers. In the French mizzen-top there was a keen-eyed Tyrolese, in glazed cocked-hat, and white frock, especially active. He was a fellow who, after hours of crag-climbing, had known a week's food and profit depend on the one shot at a steinbock, and he did not throw away his cartridges.

At fifteen minutes past one, a quarter of an hour before the Redoubtable struck, Lord Nelson and Captain Hardy were walking near the middle of the quarter-deck; the admiral had just commended the manner in which one of the ships near him was fought. Captain Hardy advanced from him to give the necessary directions, Nelson was near the hatchway, in the act of turning with his face towards the stern, when a musket-ball struck the admiral on the left shoulder, and entering the epaulet, passed through his spine, and lodged in the muscles of his back towards the right side. He instantly fell with his face on the deck, in the very place that was covered with the blood of his secretary, Mr. Scott. Captain Hardy on turning round, saw to his horror the sergeant of marines Secker, with two marines raising Nelson from the deck.

"Hardy," said his lordship, "I believe they have done it at last; my backbone is shot through."

Some of the crew bore the admiral down to the cockpit, several wounded officers and about forty men being carried below at the same time, amongst whom were Lieutenant Rann and Mr. Whipple, captain's clerk, both whom died soon afterwards. Whilst the seamen were conveying Lord Nelson down the ladder from the middle deck, he observed, careless of his own sufferings, that the tiller-ropes had not been re-placed, and desired one of his midshipmen to remind Captain Hardy of it, and to request that new ones should be immediately rove. He then covered his face and stars with his handkerchief that he might be less observed by his men. Surgeon (afterwards Sir William) Beatty was then called, and very soon afterwards the Rev. Mr. Scott. His Lordship's clothes were taken off, that the direction of the ball might be better ascertained.

"You can be of no use to me, Beatty," said Lord Nelson; "go and attend to those whose lives can be preserved."

When the surgeon had executed his melancholy office, and found the wound to be mortal, he repressed the general feeling that prevailed. He had again been urged by the admiral to go and attend to his other duties, and he reluctantly obeyed, but continued to return at intervals. As the blood flowed internally from the wound, the lower cavity of the chest gradually filled; Lord Nelson, therefore, constantly desired Burke to raise him, and complained of an excessive thirst. In In this state of sufferiug he anxiously inquired for Capt. Hardy to know whether the annihilation of the enemy might be depended on; but it was upwards of an hour before that officer could, at so critical a moment, leave the deck; and Lord Nelson became apprehensive that his bravo associate was dead. The crew of the Victory were now heard to cheer, and he anxiously demanded the cause, when Lieutenant Pasco who lay wounded near him, said that one of the opponents had struck. A gleam of joy at each shout lighted up the countenance of Nelson, and as the crew repeated their cheers and marked the progress of his victory and more captures, his satisfaction visibly increased.

At half-past two the Santa Anna struck to Collingwood. The Bellerophon had also done well. At half-past twelve she had broke through the enemy's line, astern of the Spanish two-decker Monaca. She engaged her at the muzzles of her guns, blew up her hanging magazine, and captured her. She then ran on board of L'Aigle, a vessel crowded with troops. The tremendous fire soon left only fifteen of our men alive on the quarter-deck; but the fire from our lower-deck drove the French from their guns; and L'Aigle soon afterwards struck to the Defiance. The lower-deck men had chalked on their guns, as their motto, the words, "Victory or death." The Bellerophon was three times set on fire, and three times the fire was put out quietly, and without excitement.

The Spaniards had fought well, but they, too, now gave way. The Argonauta and Bahama had each lost four thoudred men, the St. Juan Nepomuceno three hundred and fifty. The men of the Santissima, unable to endure our fire, leaped overboard, and were helped into the Victory. The crews of five of the French ships, fought by us muzzle to muzzle, had shut their lower-deck ports, and deserted their guns.

In the mean time, Nelson lay in agony and in great anxiety about the action. He kept saying:

"Will no one bring Hardy to me? He must be killed; I am certain that he is dead."

Mr. Bulkly, the captain's aide-de-camp, then came below, and, in a low voice communicated to the surgeon the particular circumstances respecting the fleet which had detained Captain Hardy, but promised that he would take the first moment offered to leave the deck. The excessive heat of the cockpit from the number of the dead and wounded, increased the faintness of the dying admiral, and his sight now became dim.

"Who brought the message?" he said, feebly.

"Bulkty, my lord," replied Burke,

"It is his voice," said Nelson. "Remember me, Bulkly, to your father,"

Captain Hardy came down from the deck in about fifty minutes, and anxiously strove to conceal his feelings. The friends shook hands in silence. Nelson spoke first.

"Well, Hardy, how goes the day with us?"

"Very well. Ten ships, my lord have struck,"

"But none of ours, I hope?"

"There is no fear of that my lord. Five of their van have tacked, and show an intention of bearing down upon us; but I have called some of our fresh ships round the Victory, and have no doubt of giving them a drubbing."

Having said this, he found himself unable any longer to suppress his tears, and he hurried away.

The firing continued, and the cheering of the men was occasionally heard amidst its repeated peals. With a wish to support his spirits, that were in some degree shaken by having seen the friend he so sincerely regarded, and from the increased pain, the agonies of excessive thirst and the great difficulty of respiration, Burke said:

"I still hope, my lord, you will carry this glorious news home."

"Don't talk nouscnse," replied the admiral. "One would, indeed, like to live a little longer; but I know it to be impossible. God's will be done. I have performed my duty, and I devoutly thank him for it. A wounded seaman was lying near him on a pallet, waiting for amputation, and, in the bustle that prevailed, was hurt by some person passing by. Nelson, weak as he was, indignantly turned his head, and, with his usual authority, rebuked the man for not having more humanity. Some time afterwards, he was again visited by the surgeon.

"You know I am gone—I feel it. I find," said he "something rising in my breast, which tells me" (putting his hand on his left side) "I shall soon be gone. God be praised that I have done my duty. My pain is so severe that I devoutly wish to be released. Yet," said he, in a lower voice, "one would like to live a little longer, to!"

A spirited, fierce, rapid fire had been kept up from the Victory's starboard guns on the Redoutable for about fifteen minutes after Lord Nelson was wounded; in which time Captain Adair and about eighteen seamen and marines were killed, and Lieutenant Bligh, Mr. Palmer, midshipman, and twenty seamen and marines were wounded, by the enemy's musketry alone. The Redoubtable had been twice on fire in her fore-chains and on the forecastle, and by throwing some combustables, had set fire to the Victory's boom; the alarm was given, and it reached the cockpit; yet neither hurry nor trepidation appeared, and the crew having put out the flames, immediately turned their attention to the Redoubtable, and rendered her all the assistance in her power. On the colors of that ship being struck—twenty minutes after Nelson fell—and there being no possibility of boarding her from the state of ruin of both ships, the great space between the two gangways, and the closing of the enemy's ports, some seamen immediately volunteered their services to Lieutenant Quillam to jump overboard, and by swimming under the bows of the Redoubtable, to endeavor to secure the prize. But Captain Hardy thought the lives of such men too valuable to be risked by so desperate an attempt. When the firing from the Victory had in some measure ceased, and the glorious results of the day accomplished, Captain Hardy immediately visited the dying chief, and reported that fourteen or fifteen vessels had already struck.

"That's well!" cried Nelson, exultingly; but I bargained for twenty." Then, in a louder and stronger voice, he said, "God be praised, Hardy; bring the fleet to an anchor."

Captain Hardy hinted at the command devolving on Admiral Collingwood. Nelson replied, somewhat indignantly: "Not whilst I live, I hope, Hardy!" vainly endeavoring at the moment to raise himself on his pallet. "Do you," said he, "bring the fleet to anchor."

Captain Hardy was returning to the deck, when the admiral called him back, and begged him to come nearer. Lord Nelson, then delivered his last injunctions, which were, that his hair might be cut off and given to Lady Hamilton, and that his body might not be thrown overboard, but be carried home to be buried, unless his sovereign should otherwise desire, by the house of his father and mother.

"Take care of my dear Lady Hamilton, Hardy; take care of poor Lady Hamilton."

He then took Captain Hardy by the hand, and observing that he would most probably not see him again alive, the dying hero desired his bosom associate to kiss him. He did so on the cheek. He stood for a few minutes in silent agony, then, kneeling down, he kissed his dying friend's forehead.

"Who is that?" said the hero.

"It is Hardy, my lord."

"God bless you, Hardy!" replied Nelson, feebly.

Hardy then left him forever. Nelson afterwards said:

"I wish he had not left the deck; I shall soon be gone."

Death was rapidly approaching. He said to the chaplain, "Doctor, I have been a great sinner." And, after a pause, "Remember that I leave Lady Hamilton and my daughter Horatia as a legacy to my country."

His voice then gradually became inarticulate, with an evident increase of pain; when, after a feeble struggle, these last words were distinctly heard:

"I have done my duty; I praise God for it."

Having said this, the hero turned towards Burke, on whose arm he had been supported, and expired without a groan at thirty minutes after four, three hours and a quarter after he had been struck. Within a quarter of an hour of going below there were only two Frenchmen left alive on the mizzen-top of the Redoutable. One of them was the Tyrolese who killed Nelson. An old quartermaster recognized his hat and white frock.

This quartermaster and two midshipmen, Mr. Collingwood and Mr. Pollard, were the only persons left in the Victory's poop;—the two midshipmen kept firing at the top and he supplied them with cartridges. One of the Frenchmen, attempting to make his escape down the rigging, was shot by Mr. Pollard, and fell on the poop. But the old quartermaster, as he cried out," That's he—that's he," and pointed at the other, who was coming forward to fire again, received a shot in his mouth, and fell dead. Both the midshipmen then fired at the same time, and the fellow dropped in the top. When they took possession of the prize, they went into the mizzen-top, and found him dead; with one ball through his head, and another through his breast.

The last guns fired on the cowed and flying enemy were heard a minute or two before Nelson's great heart ceased to beat. They were his triumphant knell. Rear-Admiral Dumanoir, with four of the van, fired, as they passed, into the Victory, the Royal Sovereign, and the captured Spanish vessels, to the indignation of their vanquished allies. But the fugitives were unlucky, for Sir Richard Strachan bagged them all soon after.

Our loss in this great and crowning battle was one thousand five hundred and eighty seven men. Twenty of the enemy's ships struck, but only four were saved. A strong gale coming on that night from the southwest, Collingwood found it impossible to anchor. The Spanish vice-admiral, Aliva, died of his wounds. Villeneuve was sent back to Franco, and dreading a court-martial, destroyed himself on the road to Paris.

At home the greatness of the victory seemed to be forgotten in the greatness of the nations sorrow. England now felt what a hero she had bred. Not the poorest man in the country but felt the loss as if his father had died. The national gratitude surged over. Nelson's brother was made an earl, with a grant of six thousand pounds a year; ten thousand pounds were voted to each of his sisters; and one hundred thousand pounds granted for the purchase of an estate. A public funeral was decreed, and a public monument in St. Paul's. The leaden coffin, in which he was brought home, was cut into relics. As he was lowered into the vault of St. Paul's Cathedral, the sailors, as if by agreement, tore the flag that covered his coffin into strips, to keep till their dying day, and then leave their children as heirlooms and incitements to glory.

Nor was brave Collingwood forgotten. He was made baron, and had a pension of two thousand pounds for his life, with an annuity after his death of one thousand pounds to his wife, and five hundred pounds to his two daughters. Two days after the battle of Austerlitz the dead body of Nelson arrived off Portsmouth. Austerlitz was a great blow, but did not make up for Trafalgar. The body of Nelson lay in state at Greenwich on January 5, on the 8th it was taken to the Admiralty, and on the 9th was interred in St. Paul's, the Prince of Wales being present, and ten thousand soldiers of the line. Thirty-four years before, a thin sickly boy, the son of a Norfolk clergyman, had joined his uncle's ship the Raisonnable, of sixty-four guns; this same boy afterwards the bulwark of England, was now laid in his sumptuous grave, and upon his grave fell the tears of a great and grateful and sorrow-stricken nation. Our hearts of oak may turn to iron, our rough sailors to dexterous engineers, but will the memory of Nelson ever be forgotten while the blue sea girdles the chalk ramparts of Old England?

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO,.....SATURDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1867.

A NARROW CRITICISM.

A CERTAIN catholicity of taste, by which its possessor is enabled to appreciate excellencies and beauties of the most diverse character, is an indispensable qualification of the true critic. But unfortunately it is as rare as it is valuable. The enthusiastic admirer of Dickens seldom appreciates as they deserve, the peculiar merits of Thackeray; and the alleged cynicism of the one is not more offensive to the partizans of the other, than the exaggerated sentimentalism of the former is to those of the latter. Cordially to admire that which is peculiar and characteristic in each, requires a broad range of taste and sympathy, and a capacity for regarding human character and the aspects of social life from different stand-points that is not often possessed by those who assume to discharge the functions of the critic. It is edifying to note how invariably the narrowness that sets up one particular kind of literary excellence as a standard, and refuses to recognize any other, deals in illegitimate and unintelligent comparisons. The critic of this school, having sworn allegiance to some particular novelist, or poet, judges of all others according to their approximation to this chosen model. Thus, Longfellow is sneered at as a "shallow and melodious versifier," because he does not deal in metaphysical subtleties like Browning; while the author of "Paracelsus" is pronounced a dealer in obscure enigmas, and no poet, because the idiosyncrasies of his genius are continually luring him with an irresistible attraction toward the dim twilight region of unsolved and perhaps, so far as the intellect is concerned, insoluble philosophical and psychological mysteries. As there is some element of truth in every religious system that has ever exercised any large influence upon the destinies of mankind, there is always sure to be something admirable in every work of art or literature that has won wide appreciation; and where intelligent critics fail to discover this germ of excellence, the failure is due to their own narrowness and want of catholicity. A criticism, or as the writer modestly terms it, a "notice" of the poems of Charles Warren Stoddard, that has recently appeared in the Virginia Territorial Enterprise, has suggested the foregoing remarks. In the article referred to, Mr. Stoddard is declared with a certain majesterial air, to be a mere "trifler in the realm of song." "He sings," says the critic of the Enterprise, with a pleasant assumption of preternatural insight that might become an oracle or a spiritualistic medium, "from a desire to have his voice heard, and not from a necessity of unburdening his heart of an oppressive weight of passion, nor from an irresistible impulse to give utterance to the earnest convictions of his soul."

This is very smooth and pretty, besides being deliciously vague. But it smacks somewhat too strongly of a style of criticism which belongs to a past generation, and which has now, fortunately, gone out of fashion. It is not a violent assumption, to say that most poets who "sing" to the public through the prosaic and business-like medium of a publisher, desire to have their voices heard; and if all those who cannot plead the necessity of unburdening their hearts of an oppressive weight of passion," or an "irresistible impulse to give utterance to the earnest convictions of their souls," in justification of their attempts to woo the poetic muse, are to be summarily dismissed as "triflers in the realm of song," there are innumerable bards who have long maintained an honorable place among the bright particular stars" of the firmament of literature, whose claims will have to be reconsidered. We do not ourselves clearly see how Horace, or Terence, or Aristophanes, or Anacreon, or Tasso, or Chaucer, or Spenser or Goethe, or Dryden, or Pope, or Campbell, or Tennyson, could honestly interpose such a plea in bar of the indictment of the Sage Brush critic. None of these sane and healthy-minded poets would, we think, confess to any "necessity of unburdening their hearts of an oppressive weight of passion" or to any irresistible longing to give utterance to the earnest convictions of their souls." None of them were enthusiasts or lunatics or system-mongers. They were men of sense, of wholesome sympathy with life and nature, who were too strong and too exempt from all passion or febrile emotion to be infected by the taint of morbidness, which is too often the inspiration of poets of a single song. In his most gracious mood, the Nevada critic concedes some slight modicum of the "afflatus" to our poet. He says that "as musical trifles, dainty conceits, exquisite similes, graceful expressions, and much else that pleases yet virtually amounts to nothing, some of the poems are perfect, and there are none but possess a a respectable degree of merit." Again the oracle says, "In speaking of Mr. Stoddard's poems as destitute of earnestness and vigor, of lofty sentiment and heroic aim, the worst has been said of them."

The "nearest approach to a poem, in Mr. Stoddard's volume is declared by the Sage Brush critic to be "The Awakening and then, the weakest piece in the volume, entitled "Desire," is quoted as "a fair specimen of Mr. Stoddard's powers of versification." We have heretofore recorded our own judgment upon Mr. Stoddard's poems, and we are quite satisfied to leave the issue between the Nevada critic and ourselves, to the arbitrament of the critical authorities whose verdict on questions of this character is regarded by the literary world as authoritive and final.

CALIFORNIAN IMPROVIDENCE.

NOWHERE in the civilized world probably is the proportion of improvident people, who, while in the receipt of large, or of moderate incomes, nevertheless accumulate nothing, so large as in California. Of the old Californians who are wealthy, there are very few who have become so by any gradual process. Instances where suddenly acquired fortunes have been steadily improved are not wanting, but cases, so common in other countries, of competence slowly gained by wise frugality, and patient thrift, are exceedingly rare. In every part of the State are to be found men who have made and wasted fortunes, and who are now old or growing old, without any provision for age or sickness. "Of this "sorrowful multitude," as they have been aptly designated, some are decrepid, and many almost friendless. "Hundreds," says the Woodland News, "who, in the vigor of manhood and hope, came and smote the under-rock in vain, and sank to helplessness under disease, despair, or the dread destroyer—drink. We meet them everywhere—in the metropolis, the inland town, and in the lonesome defiles of the mountain—white-haired, shriveled, tottering and consuming under the mildew of premature age. Lost to home and friends, too feeble to work, unable to reach their kindred, where can they go but to the hospitable grave? Poorer than the foxes, more homeless than the birds of the air, who will care for them? who will assist them, with a friendly hand, down to the shadowy valley where the waves of eternity sound from the unseen shore?"

But in the great majority of cases, the forlorn condition of the "sorrowful multitude," is not to be traced to ill-fortune. It is not because they have been dogged by poverty, and that they "smote the under rock in vain," but because it has never entered into their calculations to acquire an independence by gradual accumulations. Small gains which in the aggregate would have constituted a fortune, were squandered as too inconsiderable to be cared for; and no other mode of becoming rich or independent was dreamed of, except by some sudden stroke of "luck," or some successful speculation. The "sorrowful multitude" are the natural result of the condition of things that prevailed in California in "the early days," a condition of things which like the class itself is rapidly passing away. There are numerous indications that the rising generation of Californians will be as remarkable for steady and patient energy, in business, as the present is for brilliant schemes and daring enterprise, and that the improvidence and recklessness that characterized the first period of the State, will disappear with the social conditions by which they were naturally engendered.

CAPRIFOLIUM.

THE evening star signaled the night,
Day drew his golden sandals off;
A slender ray of crescent light
Shot from the East, in covert scoff.

I paused upon the porch, and gazed
In orbs that Sleep would soon eclipse;
The honeysuckles grew amazed,
Or else I touched her finger-tips.

"'Tis time to part," the clock-bell rung,
"'Tis time to part," my lips replied;
Her hands upon my shoulders hung,
She faltering blushed, "denied."

Her odorous mouth was very near,
The ardent Summer gave me leave·
My own forgot itself, I fear—
I felt her 'wildering bosom heave.

The honeysuckle's teadrils caught,
And round us close their clingers cast;
Within her eyes I read this thought:
"What tender things have made us fast!"

The evening star fled down the night:
The jealous Moon stared from the hill,
And heard this murmur of delight:
"Sweet honeysuckles, have your will!"

A transport fragrance worldward blew,
And nothing had hut this to tell:
hear the bridal vows of two,
And go to ring the marriage bell."

The bell is rung, the ring is wrought;
The honeysuckle's slender vine
Indents the circle that has brought Us unison and bliss divine.

"Dear self," I said, "while love is true,
The Honeysuckle we will praise;
And round our doorway it shall strew
Betrothal scents always."

She spoke no word, but in her eyes
I read the answer I would hear,
And, constant as the Summer skies,
The flower we prize embalms the year.

City Gardens.—These gardens look beautiful at present. The many attractions here induce crowds to visit it during leisure hours. The chalybeate spring is of course a sure cure for rheumatism, consumption, and many other diseases, but the water is not pleasant, and in fact many of the visitors declare that they prefer whisky to this wholesome and life-giving beverage. The croquet ground induces many ladies and children to indulge in this game which is now all the rage. The lions, bears, monkeys, and other animals are in a fine condition, and the young giant bear in the vicinity of the bowling alleys is the admired of all beholders.

Farewell Benefit to Signor and Signora Bianchi.—The farewell benefit to these favorite artistes, whose presence in San Francisco has done so much towards establishing Italian Opera as one of the institutions of the city, took place last evening at the Metropolitan Theatre. We were glad to observe that at the time of our going to press the box sheet was nearly filled up, and there was every promise that our pioneer prima donna soprano and prima tenore would receive such testimonial from the public of San Francisco as their untiring efforts have justly entitled them to.

Those Poor Dogs.—About a year ago, the "Lion's Mouth" man of the Californian, in spite of our protestations, commenced a series of attacks on the law which authorized the slaughter of all unmuzzled dogs in the city. We knew that small children had been bitten by big dogs, (the "Lion's Mouth" man declared this happened only in cases where bad little boys and girls teased good dogs,) and declared that the public at large would never be persuaded that dogs ought not to be compelled to wear muzzles. The "Lion's Month" man, with his usual obstinacy, declared his intention of converting all the papers of San Francisco to his views, namely, that the existing dog law was brutal and unjustifiable. We thought differently, but we must confess that the Alta, Bulletin, Morning Call and Dramatic Chronicle have come round to the aforesaid L. M.'s way of thinking, and that unless the poor dogs are left alone, a revolution is imminent.

Mrs. Lincoln's Shawls.—The indignation at Mrs. Lincoln's selling a portion of her wardrobe has probably been stimulated by the exposure of the fact that she possessed five camel's hair shawls (! ! ! the notes of admiration are suggested by a lady) while the wife of many of the chief men of Utica, Rome, Weathersfield, (Conn.,) and other equally important towns has not one to her back.

A HURRIED TRIP TO VISALIA AND BACK.

MR. EDITOR.—Have yon ever been to Visalia? perhaps not:—I have asked a goodly number of people the same question, and the greater portion answer in the negative. A few days ago it was necessary that your humble servant should go down there, and one fine morning saw me on the San Jose early train, en route to catch the stage. I give you the resnlts of a few notes jotted down on the journey. Arriving at the depot, three well appointed coaches are waiting for the cars, and if you want a hox seat, it is necessary to make a rush for it. However, in my case, the urbane and lively agent, W. Roberts, gave me the desired position without delay, and in a few minutes we were howling merrily along, merely calling at Wells & Fargo's for the express box. The lines are handled by a driver most appropriately styled "Long John," on this ronte as far as the foot of the monntain. The road as far as Gilroy was in a most ahominable condition, literally knee-deep in a delicions fine dust, which on this occasion most pertinaciously hung around us, being kept in motion hy a cheerful little hreeze from behind. I never traveled in so wretched a dust before, and in many places it was ntterly impossible to see the leaders. The coaches, which, owing to an opposition, ran as far as Gilroy for a most reasonable fare, is generally full to this statiou. Onr coach changed horses at the fourteen mile house, where hy no means a good dinner, was provided. This, I helieve, was an exception to the general rule, as this house bears a good name for meals. Reaching Gilroy we change horses again, and then turning off sharp to the left, leave the villainous dust behind us, and go through a most delightful country for twenty miles to the new station, Bell's, at the foot of the monntain. This road takes ns over Dunn's hill, and ronnd Soap Lake, at this time of the year very low and dry; but in winter a regular bughear to the stage drivers. Numerous places and scenes of past scrapes and dangers are pointed out hy the driver, and the idea involuntarily crosses a stranger's mind why the creeks are not hridged and made good. Sosp Lake is full of wild fowl, they appeared very tame and looked as if they were not mnch disturhed. Along here the conntry is mostly fenced and nnder cultivation, and large improvements are being carried on in a rapid and snhstantial manner. Crossing several creeks, (sll dry,) we reached Bell's just after dnsk had set in, distnrhing a small herd of deer which were browsing on the track within a mile of the honse. At this hotel we had supper and prepared for the ascent of the mountain. By this time most of the passengers had left the stage, and we were redneed to seven, who were going "right throngh." Across the mountain a road has heen made which is now leased hy Mr. Thoms, the spirited stago proprietor.

Now let me give any intending traveler a hint, that is: not to go beyond Bell's without laying in a moderate stock of whisky. It gets very cold crossing the hill and not a house do you see where you can get a nip this side of of Firehaugh's, distant some eleven hours' good traveling. At Bell's we changed drivers, and after a very short delay, went on nnder the guidance of "Mike," who has the most difficult part of the road to drive, as three times a week he crosses this hill both ways. The hill is twelve miles over, and of course the ascent is slow. It so happened that the night was dark hnt fine, and as there was scarcely any moon it was impossihle to notice the beauties of the scenery. A good deal of the road rnns throngh a ravine, and the grades in and out might very readily have been huilt somewhat wider with very little more expense, and a great increase of safety and comfort. After warming onr poor feet with an occasional walk, passing throngh clonds of quail, which rise at every step, we reach the top, and the descent is comparatively easy, and on striking the hottom the route lies along a vast plain right into Visalia. About seven miles from the foot of the hill we came to the San Louis Rancho, close to which is the private station of the line. By this hour the weather had become very chilly, and the cold continned to increase nntil daylight.

By this time the inside passengers were attempting to sleep, an operation almost impossible from the rongh nature of the road. From San Louis the team runs twenty-eight miles, and at Cottonwood Creek we met the returning stage. The drivers exchanged boxes, returning to their respective ends. A few minutes conversation is carried on hy the meeting passengers. However, off we go again, and do not pnll up till we reach another private station, the "Lone Willow." Sam Merrill, the driver, does not take long in making his change, and away we go again to Firebangh's, fourteen miles. The journey throughont the night is dull and monotonons, the dead level road and the absence of anything to see except the line of telegraph posts, on the top of three or four of which snllenly and sleepily sits a solitary eagle, do not render this portion of the trip lively, and from not hearing any of the "insides" talking, you natnrally conclude that their conversational powers are ended and that they are all gone asleep. Just at five the daylight began to show itself simnltaneously with a light shining from the Ferry House windows, and right glad did everyone feel when the coach stopped and we were warned to "change coaches here and get breakfast," for which a cold ride of eleven hours had made every one prepared. A rinse in a large hucket, and a warm hy a good fire, together with a cocktail, make yon feel a better opinion of the world, and you go cheerfully to a good breakfast provided by Chinese servants, who at this early honr look more sleepy than usual.

At 5:30 we all responded to the "All aboard." The morning was grand, and the scenery around here is very pretty. The river ahounding with fine fish runs close to the house, and we soon saw plenty of game in the way of wild fowl, hares, rahhits and a few groups of antelope. The coach into which we exchanged was piloted by "Old Jeff."—an old soldier and a very general traveler in this country. He is a capital fellow, and his experiences, as he relates them, fairly break all the monotony and tediousness of the road. Some of the yarns are startling to say the least of them. Jeff. drives right into Visalia, a work of ahout fourteen hours every day. In course of time, the stage reaches Fresno City. The only trouhle is to find the city, which consists of a store, a small hridge and a barn. In the Winter, small steamers ply this distance from Stockton, hut are of course unable to run dnring the dry weather. Still plains, for twenty-eight miles, when we change horses at a private station, erected on Hawthorne Rancho, and then again for seventeen miles, when we dine most comfortably off quail and other game at the house of a bachelor. A short delay is Jeff.'s motto, and away we grind again over a horrihly rongh road for another seventeen miles to Kingston, the ferry of King River. Like Firebaugh's, this little place, and a nice little place it is, is furnished with a telegraph station, a matter of great convenience on the road. King's River is crossed hy a ferry, which, on hoth occasions when I saw it, worked very badly, owing to the scarcity of water. The next station is distant thirteen miles, sitnsted at Cross Creeks, a remarkably nasty place in Winter; and from there it is twelve miles to Visalia, which town we reach about 6:30 P. M.. The latter portion of the route shows a few more houses: hut the plains are covered with cattle, which looked, considering all things, in splendid condition. The Tulare district I should put down as purely a stock country, and as snch it mnst be of great value. The road passes in view of some of the ranches helonging to the most wealthy ranch-holders in the State.

Arriving in Visalia, we were put down at the Exchange Hotel, at the corner of Main street. This house is kept by Captain Gordon, who, together with his accomplished lady, do all in their power to make visitors comfortahle. I happened to reach Visalia on Saturday, the last day of the Tulare race meeting, and the town was very full and pretty noisy. Visalia, I should say, is a good place for whisky, and gamhling is, I helieve, considerahly carried on. The popnlation of the town, is about 280. The town is very neat and tidy, hoasts some good gardens, where splendid fruit in any quantities is grown; hnt agricultural pursuits are not very much followed up.

The races had evidently caused a good deal of excitement, and a good many matches were on the tapis on Saturday night.

Sunday morning broke very dull, and at nine the rain came down heavily, lasting all day. Now, a Sunday in a country town is not a very lively day under any circumstances; but a wet Sunday, in a strange country town, is worse still, and so I found it—and had it not heen for the agreeable party assembled at Gordon's, it would have been simply miserahle. Business over, I left on my return on the following Monday morning—hut oh! what a chsnge in the road. The rain had heen very general, and great was the difference in the traveling comfort. The soil, hlack and sticky, (particularly near Fresno,) made the work on the horses very hard indeed, and it is easy to judge how bad must be the whole route in the rainy season. But the drivers went at it, and we got along in time to catch the cars at San Jose on Tuesday afternoon as usual, and with the advantage of having no dust in the neighborhood of Gilroy.

The trip is a most pleasant one, and I strongly recommend any one who wants to see a fine stock conntry to go through to Tulare. The coaches are comfortable, and Mr. Thoms, the pioneer of the route, deserves infinite credit for the way in which he has stocked the line. It wonld he a hard matter to go anywhere and find better stock. The horses are good and in fine condition, which they need to be for this winter campaign. In short the whole road is well appointed. and the civility and attention of the drivers, one and all, make the hox seat an enviable place to be obtained.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

DAN BRYANT is still the reigning star at Magnire's Opera House. This week was signalized by the prodnction on Monday evening of Arrah-na-Pogue. The cast was a good one, and the new scenery hy Mr. Burberry was extremely fine. Dan Bryant did not invest the part of "Shann the Post" with the pathos which characterized it in the hands of Charles Wheatleigh. Mrs. Sophie Edwin reassumed the part of "Arrah Meelish," and displayed mnch pathetic power in its rendition. H. Edwards in the character of "Colonel Bagenal O'Grady," wss qnite at home and acted capitally, D. C. Anderson's "Major Coffin" was of course, nnexceptionahly good. H. Coad grappled the character of "Michael Feeny" manfully and gained much applause, Miss Sallie Hinckley's "Fanny Power" was a capital piece of acting; she played the reckless, passionate, good-hearted Irish girl to the life. Willie Edouin caused mnch fun as "Winterbottom," and in fact all the characters were well played. This afternoon an Arrah-na-Pogue matinee will he given, and this popnlar play will he performed nntil fnrther notice. The new play of the Caste, which has proved so snccessful in the East is in active preparation, and will shortly he produced in a style of perfectness which should ensure success.

On Thursday night Henri Herberte the favorite tenor received a complimentary henefit at Platt's Hall, tendered him prior to his departure for New York and Europe. A highly popular programme was prepared and a splendid house was present. In the first part, Henri Herherte sang a Scotch hallad entitled "My Mary O!" words by James Linen, music hy F. A. Howson. Californians are rather slow to acknowledge merit in the works of onr home composers hut I think all must acknowledge that this little hallad is full of melody and reflects credit on its composer, It was enthusiastically encored. Messrs. Leslie and Raynor convulsed the sndience by their performances; that entitled "Cosmopolitan" is especially good. The first part of the performance concinded with "The Image of the Rose," hy "The Twelve," of which Henri Herberte is a memher. Mr. Wunderlich who was in msgnificent voice, sang "I am a Frair of Orders Grey," with fine effect, and on heing encored gave "the Standard Bearer." Mr. Birch, whose late polygraphic entertainments at Dashaway Hall were so popular, made a little comic address, sang "The Twins," and in response to a loud encore, re-appeared in character and made everyone laugh heartily by the comic manner in which he recounted in verse, the trouhles of an an aged grocery-store keeper who could only see his sweetheart once a week, Mrs. Leach and Herberte sang the duet "When this Bosom heaves a Sigh" very finely. A pretty little madrigal with quite the old-time flavor about it, entitled, "Three June Roses," was composed for this occasion hy Frank A. Howson, and sung hy Misses E. and C. Howson, H. Herberte and F. Howson. Harry Raynor gave his inimitahle performance on the Japanese fiddle, and was called out four times. Henri Herberte sang "The Last Good Night, and in response to an encore "The Anchor's Weighed," and the performance concluded with "The Waltze" snng hy the "The Twelve." Professor Evans presided at the piano most ably, and in the first part played a solo entitled "Silver Spring." Every one worked hard to please one of the most easily-pleased audiences ever assembled in Platt's Hall, and most thoroughly did they succeed. Everything was encored, every one received a warm welcome, and the smiling faces of the members of the audience showed that they were determined to enjoy themslves. An apology was made for the non-attendance of the Motet and Madrigal Society. But the gap caused hy their absence, was well filled up hy constant encores. Henri Herberte may well be proud of the compliment paid him, there are few artistes in San Francisco who wonld have been honored by such a house. All will he glad to hear that Henri Herberte's departnre will not be immediate as he has accepted an engagement at Messrs. Leslie, Raynor & Smith's "New Temple of Music" which was opened last night.

At the Metropolitan Theatre Azael the Prodigal, has run good houses throughout the week and delighted all who have witnessed its grand processions, fantastic dances, gorgeons scenery and strange stage effects. The mnsic of this play is very fine and is well executed by the strong force of musical artistes engaged. Other startling novelties are in active preparation and no pains or money will be spared in placing them on the stage.

Messrs. Leslie, Raynor & Smith opened their heantiful New Temple of Music last night. Long before the rising of the curtain every seat was occupied, and a placard announcing to the ontside pnblic, discouraging words, "House Fnll" on it, was affixed to the door, and scores were unable to ohtain admittance to the door. The arrangements at this establishment are qnite first-clsss. Gentlemanly ushers in full dress, white neckties, and kids inclnded, show visitor sto their seats and hand the ladies fans, programmes, and glasses of ice-water. The programme, printed by Towne & Bacon, is extremely neat. It consists of four pages of note paper on which are printed the list of the performances for the evening and the words of the songs, without a single advertisement to deface them. The performance last night was admirahle and the audience enthnsisstic in its applanse. I have not time now to enumerate the many attractive performances which made up the programme; suffice it to say, that the opening of the New Temple of Mnsic proved a grand success, and all who were present were satisfied that this place of amnsement is destined to supply a want long felt in this city.

TOUCHSTONE.

TWO FRENCH DOG STORIES.

EVERY dog has his day, some dogs have two days; one, the short span of canine life, the more enduring existence of fame. M. Emile Richebourg has just collected a number of the latter into an amusing volume entitled Histoire des Chiens Celébres. Some publisher doubtless, give this, entire, to the public in an English dress; meanwhile we introduce our readers to two only of his celebrated dogs.

The first was a spaniel, and his name was Cabriole. His master, the Comte de Brevonne's chief, or man cook had brought him up from a puppy, paying particular attention to his fetching and carrying. Cabriole would catch a half-franc piece in the air, and take it to the person named to him, often residing at a considerable distance. When an errand had to be done, he took the basket in his mouth and went for tobacco, coffee, sugar, cheese, or any other article of daily use, which happened to be required in an emergency, Why send a dog and not a servant? For this good reason. The comte's château is five miles distant from Langre, the nearest market-town. A servant would take three hours to go there and back and make his purchases; the dog, when encouraged to exert himself did it in three quarters of an hour. The dog knew all the tradesmen; a card in the basket mentioned what was wanted; and one tradesman sent him on to the next.

One Friday, more unlucky than the rest of Fridays, four persons called at the château. They were asked to stop and dine; the invitation was accepted, and the cook was ordered to prepare a suitable meagre dinner. It was four in the afternoon, and the unfortunate chief had nothing, absolutely nothing, except kidney, beans and lentils. How could he compose a "suitable" dinner with that? His hair almost lifted his cap from his head. "If I had only a little fish!" he groaned, banging his saucepans about in despair. But I haven't so much as a red-herring. Here, Cabriole; you must help me out of this mess." Cabriole took the basket and his orders, and darted away from the château like an arrow. In twenty minutes he reached the town. The fishwoman to whom he presented himself, glanced at the card, and took six handsome eels out of the tub of water. That the cook might have no doubt of their freshness, she refrained from killing them. Merely tying them in a napkin, and putting them into the basket strong and alive. Cabriole thanked her with a thoughtless wag of his tail, and immediately set off on his way back home.

Poor innocent dog! He thought that his charge would be as easy to carry as a pound of coffee. For a while, the eels lay quiet enough; but having their doubts, perhaps, respecting the object of their journey, their heads were soon peeping out of the basket. Cabriole perceived it. Surprised, but not intimidated, he growled and snarled and shook the basket to make them keep still. The move succeeded, but before long, the eels again felt a wish to look about them. This time he set the basket down and drove them back into it with strokes of his paw. Once more they lay quiet for a for a minute or two, allowing him to proceed on his journey homewards. But eels are slippery. Not content with looking out, they crawled out, and were making their escape. Cabriole, in a rage, set the basket down, picked them up, one by one, and returned them to the basket. As fast as he did so, they crept out again; until losing all patience, he killed them each and several, by a sharp bite applied to the neck. He then put them into the basket, and set off for the château at railway speed.

But all this required time. The cook getting fidgety, had sent forward one of his assistants to see what was the cause of the delay; and to this witness we are indebted for the correct knowledge of what occurred. Cabriole was duly praised and petted; but from that day forth, he loathed the sight of fish. If the word "eel" was pronounced in his presence, he ran away and hid himself for two or three days.

Our second canine friend was a military dog. During the First French Empire, every regiment had its dog, whose intelligence, thanks to the soldiers' care, was improved by education and discipline. The Grand Army's dogs were picked up almost everywhere, except in England. They had been recruited in Poland, in Prussia, in Holland, in Saxony, and in Flanders. They were mongrel mastiffs, hounds, Danish dogs, spaniels. But no matter whence they came, they soon turned French. Foreign dogs were naturalized without knowing it.

Rugen is an island in the Baltic Sea, opposite to Stralund, on the coast of Pomerania. Fortified by nature and by art, its situation is exceedingly strong. In time of peace, in consequence of its fertile soil, its salubrious air and its mild climate, Rugen is a delightful retreat. In time of war, it is an important post, a natural citidal, a formidable fortress, whose possession has been purchased at the expense of many a bloody fight. During the campaign of 1807, this island was comprised in the sphere of operations by the corps commanded by Marshal Davoust, and was occupied by an infantry regiment of the line, and by several companies of sappers and miners. The regiment of course, had a dog—a black and white poodle—named Capucin—not because he was born in a Capuchins' convent in Italy (which would have been quite a sufficient reason,) but in allusion to the copper or iron rings by which a gun-barrel is fastened to its stock. The dog's short bark might perhaps have been thought to resemble the snappish report of a musket,

In consequence of a change of a plan of operations ordered by Napoleon the First, the island had to be suddenly evacuated, to carry out a movement in retreat abandoning the whole line of the Pomeranian coast. Every post, every man was withdrawn: but in such a hasty way that they forgot an advanced sentinel perched on the top of a hillock which commanded the entrance of the port of Rugen. This sentinel was a young soldier who had named Firmin Bonard, who had scarcely been three years in the service. At present, a soldier who has served three years is considered quite a veteran; at that time troopers who could reckon three, five, seven and even nine years of service, were still considered conscripts. Now, Bonard the soldier, and Capucin the dog happened to be particularly good friends, bound by the strongest ties of mutual attachment.

The corporal of the post had planted Firmin as sentinel on the hillock at exactly midnight. The latter therefore calculated on being relieved at two in the morning, and also that from two till five he would have three good hours to doze and slumber in the corps-de-garde. So Firmin Bonard beguiled the time by anticipating this extreme indulgence, also by the thoughts of his village steeple, of his aged curés, ancient housekeeper, of the haystack where he used to play at hide and-seek, and sundry other recollections. In this way the minutes slipped slowly by, and the two hours' guard were drawing to a close.

All at once he heard a slight noise. He listened. "It is the corporal coming to relieve guard?" he thought, and prepared to utter the formal "Qui vive?" But the sound, which resembled that of human footsteps, was soon followed by complete silence. "I couldn't be mistaken!" he said to himself. "Besides, my time must now be up." He listened again, still more attentively. Almost immediately, he heard the barking of a dog, who came running forward in his direction. On recognising Capucin's voice, the sentinel looked round him anxiously. Perceiving nothing which threatened an attack, he wondered what could be the meaning of this nocturnal visit. Before he had time to consider the matter, the animal had climbed the hill and was jumping up his legs. "It's you, Capucin. Very good. You got tired of waiting there; and I am tired of standing here. The air is keen, and I am terribly sleepy. You should have brought the corporal with you. His watch must have stopped. He ought to sell it for old iron and buy a new one."

Capucin's answer was a frenzied bark and a series of mad leaps around his friend.

"I understand," said Firmin, smiling. "You are asking me to dance to warm myself. It's a pity you are not provided with the password and a musket."

Capucin continued to bark, running right and left like a creature possessed. Finding all these manœuvres useless, he ran up to the soldier, pulled him by the coat, and tried hard to pull him away, renewing his efforts with such violence that he tore the soldier's uniform. Firmin, considering this proof of affection more troublesome than pleasant, lost his temper, and gave poor Capucin a kick. The dog, howling at finding himself so cruelly maltreated and misunderstood, retreated to a few paces' distance; but soon returned, heedless of his friend's unkind treatment All he did now, was to look forgiveness and lick the soldier's hands.

"Be quiet, will you? And take yourself off," said Firmin, harshly, as he threatened him with the butt of his gun, to drive him away. Capucin, finding he could do no good, unwillingly made up his mind to depart. He arrived just in time to go on board with the last detachment of the corps.

At four o'clock he began to lose patience. Discipline forbade his quitting the post; but hunger, which drives the wolf out of the wood, compelled him to forget the Codo Militaire. He left his station and went to the guard-house, muttering to himself; "If anybody deserves to be shot for this, it is not I, but the corporal, who doesn't know his business, and keeps a sentinel on guard six hours at a time."

In the guard-house, not a creature! The only supposition he could form, that the regiment had gone to occupy another part of the island. He shouldered his gun and stalked off across the country in search of the regiment. On the way, he fell in with a farmer ploughing a field. "Can you tell me," he asked him, "in what direction the French have marched?"

"They are gone away," was the startling reply. "They embarked at two this morning, stepping lightly and without uttering a word, in consequence of an order received from the Emperor."

"Gone away, leaving me behind! I shall be reported as a deserter! Confound that corporal; he has been my ruin. I now understand what poor Capucin meant. It is not the death I fear, so much as the disgrace."

"Don't take on in that way," said the farmer, in a consolitary tone of voice. "Shrieking never set a broken bone. Stay here, and make the best of a bad business. If the French come back again, I can prove that it was no fault of yours."

"My good man, you don't know the severity of our rules."

"They will not punish you for a crime you have not committed. Meanwhile, you cannot live on air. You probably were brought up in the country, and are accustomed to do country work?"

"Certainly. I can plough for instance."

"The very thing for me. I can offer you good board and lodging, with a small weekly payment into the bargain. It will be the best thing you can do, under the circumstances." The soldier heaved a heavy sigh, and slowly gazed all round the horizon, to see whether any of the ships were still visible. Beholding nothing, he said at last: "I thankfully except your offer."

"Good!" said the farmer, Peter Baxen. "Come and breakfast at once. We will go on with the ploughing afterward."

At Baxen's farm the soldier-ploughman had plenty of opportunities of proving his capacity. He found such favor in the farmer's eyes—and in other people's too—that Baxen determined to try and keep him for good and all.

"My worthy fellow," he said one day, "I look upon you almost as a son."

"If my poor old father," Firmin answered, "were not anxiously awaiting my return to France, I would willingly remain in Rugen."

"You can bring him back with you, the next time you go to France. But what I want to say to you now, concerns my daughter."

Firmin colored up to the eyes.

"Unless I am much mistaken, you and she are very good friends."

Firmin uttered a few unintelligible words.

"The neighbors even say you are in love with her."

"I assure you I never uttered a word which could lead her to suppose that——"

"I know it; and for that very reason I took upon myself to tell her that, if you had no objection, she might have you for a husband."

"And she said——?"

"Not a word; but threw her arms round my neck and kissed me for a quarter of an hour." A fortnight afterward, Firmin Bonard was married to the fair-haired Clarissa, Peter Baxen's only daughter.

Four years then elapsed, pretty equally divided between love and labor. His thoughts occasionally reverted to France, but he had almost forgotten his compulsory desertion. The past soon fades from our memory when the present is satisfactory and the future promising.

One morning, the look-out man in the town of Rugen signaled a fleet of ships in the offing. They were men-of-war, carrying the French flag. "The French are coming!" people shouted to each other. "They are going to land!"

Firmin Bonard heard it. "The French are coming!" rang in his ears like the boom of an alarm-gun. It told him that he was a lost man. Nevertheless, a thought struck him, which relieved his heart by a glimmer of hope.

He ran home, put on his uniform, seized his arms, and mounted guard on the very spot where, five years before, he had been unintentionally abandoned. Meanwhile, boats full of soldiers rowed towards the hillock. In the forepart of one of the boats was a black and white poodle. As it approached the beach, the creature barked with joy. In spite of his anxiety, Firmin's eyes filled with tears as he recognized his old friend Capucin. The dog, unable to master his impatience, jumped into the sea and swam to shore.

As soon as the boats had come within ear-shot, Firmin "made ready," and shouted, at the top of his voice, "Que vive?"

"Qui vive, yourself?" said the occupants of the first boat, which was filled with officers, composing Marshal Davoust's staff. "Who are you? And what are you doing here?"

"I am a sentinel, keeping guard."

"A pretty sentinel! How long have you been on guard?"

"Five years."

"It is time to come down, then," shouted the officers, laughing.

When Firmin descended from his hill, Capucin ran to meet him half way, barking with joy, and jumping into his arms.

"Poor Capucin! Have it all your own way this time. Do whatever you like. Dirty me, tear my clothes; I shan't send you away. I ought to have made a better return for your attempt to serve me."

Followed by the faithful dog, Firmin joined his former comrades. He gave a plain account of what had happened. By a lucky chance, the corporal, who had forgotten him, and who had since been promoted, belonged to Marshal Davoust's staff. He received his old comrade with open arms. Firmin, in return, invited his countrymen to the farm, where he entertained them with liberal hospitality. The adventure reached Marshal Davoust's ears. He laughed at Firmin's stratagem, and presented him with a discharge drawn up in due form. "I should not like the brave fellow," he said "to appear before a court-martial, after having kept guard so long."

Firmin continued a farmer. He had a large family, who at present fill the highest and most important offices in the island. They are commonly known as the Sentinel's Family. When the French finally left Rugen, Capucin remained. Like his master, he forgot his military tastes, and devoted himself exclusively to farming.

[Trade Mark Registered.] WHITING & BERRY.
This is the only exclusive TEA, WINE AND SPIRIT STORE on the Pacific Coast.
It is neither a saloon or sample room, (as no wine or spirits are permitted to be drank on the premises,) but a depot where selected Teas and Pure Wines and Spirits may be procured at wholesale or retail for medicinal and family use. In this respect it is our aim to vie with Bininger & Co., New York, Bigelow & Dawes, London, and Cozzen & Co., of Washington, where every facility is offered to ladies as well as gentlemen in making their own selections and purchases in quantities to suit.
N. B.—Our Treatise on Wines, Spirits and Teas, may be had at our depot gratis, and will be mailed to consumers and dealers in the interior when requested.
WHITING & BERRY,
609 Sacramento Street, second door above Montgomery.

The Ladies are of one mind in pronouncing BOWMAN'S AMERICAN WASHING COMPOUND the best preparation for washing and cleaning in use. It is acknowledged to be a saving both in money and labor. The Compound softens the dirt, consequently the clothes require not more than one-half the rubbing necessary in washing by the old method; besides all who give it a trial acknowledge that their clothes are made whiter in washing with this Compound, than they were ever known to be by using any other preparation. For washing Woolen Goods and Flannels it cannot be equaled. Calicoes that can be washed with soap, without fading, are washed in the water used for boiling the white clothes. This Compound has been used in the eastern States for the past three years with perfect success. Warranted not to injure the clothes. For sale by all Grocers.

NOTHING LOST.

Nothing is lost: the drop of dew
That trembles on the leaf or flower,
Is hnt exhaled, to fall anew
In Snmmer's thunder shower;
Perchance to shine within the bow
That fronts the sun at fall of day—
Perchance to sparkle in the flow
Of fountains far away.

So with onr deeds, for good or ill,
They have their power, scarce understood;
Then let us use our hetter will
To make them rife with good.
Like circles on a lake they go,
Ring within ring, and never stay.
Oh! that our deeds were fashioned so
That they migbt bless alway!

BUSY IDLENESS.

By weir and river which I love,
And by the gray old mill.
In this flat, crazy ferry-boat,
I angle at my will.
And what in truth catch I?
Now while I sing
A cnuning spring
Has twitched away my fly.

I catch the sunbeams as they glance
From river-reed and tree;
I catch the bird's chirp as it comes
Aloug the air to me;
No idle hand am I,
The clouds that float
Beside my boat
Are sweeter than the sky.

ALL THE SAME.—A certain doctor, when called to children, no matter what might be the symptoms, always prescribed for one and the same malady—worms. Being summoned one day to the bedside of a little boy, he gravely sat down and having felt of the patient's pulse, looked up gravely through his spectacles, and said to the mother in a solemn tone: "Worms, madam, worms." To which the mother responded: "I tell ye, doctor, that boy hain't got a single worm. He stumbled over a stick of wood and broke his leg; and I want it set quick." The doctor, not at all non-plussed, but still determined to vindicate his theory, put on a very solemn look, as he said: "Worms, madam, I assure you—worms in the wood."

THE young lady whose feelings were "all worked up," has ordered a fresh supply.

THE SNUG.—"The Snug" has been located one door below Maguire s Opera House, for ten years past. It was established for the convenience of the habituates of the Opera House, and has the reputation of dispensing the best wines and liquors in the city, under the charge of its preseut proprietor, Mr. Timothy McCarty. Entrauces from various parts of the Opera House to the har have been cut, for the convenience of the public. Mr. McCarty gives his entire attention to his gnests, and renders his establishment a "Snug" place hy day or night.

ADDRESS

TO THE PERMANENT CITIZENS OF THE PACIFIC STATES AND TERRITORIES.

CITIZENS—We enjoy the finest country that the sun shines on, the most varied and fertile soil, the most extensive seaboard, and the greatest breadth of land having the richest metallic deposits possessed hy any one nation of the earth, a land affording all the most varied material for manufactures, wools, hides, cotton, silk, coal, fibre gums, wood, and, above all, abundance of every kind of food.

We are only a million of people, and yet have more land and sea than Russia with sixty millions—more land than France and Germany with their hundred millions of people. In the face of those vast resources, there are towns crumbling to decay, men seeking without finding employment. Something wrong here or this would not he happening. Let us consider.

The instructed mind of the population is nearly devoted to political office-seeking. Their ambition is misdirected. The rising youth are trained to idleness. This mode of thinking and training must he reversed if we would hold this magnificent country against the incoming harharian.

We must teach our youth the glories of manufactures, of commerce, of industry. We must nourish every effort, however rude, at manufacturing what we require. By devoting some of our capital and our young people to manufactures and general industries we shall soon become husy, get rich, hring more and more people into the country, create new wants, huild up new factories and villages around them; cultivate more land, huild more ships, generate more commerce, and thereby create profitable employment for all who want work.

Now, fellow-citizens, some money capital is required to help on this industrial movement. Where shall we get it? There is a considerable fund which we may divert from its present bed and channel, viz: the Insurance Fund.

Consider. The people of the Pacific States pay two hundred thousand dollars a month to the Insurance Companies for assuring them against losses from fire or shipwreck.

There are some fifteen of those Insurance offices in this city, each fishing for its share of this large fund. Each office pays a heavy rent, a half dozen officers and clerks, besides printing and advertising; the lowest cost is a thousand dollars a month on each office, and with some it is double that. There are too many persons employed in the business; too much dozing over newspapers; too much red tape and circumlocution; too high salaries and too little work. Think of two hundred thousand dollars a month! two millions and a half a year!! paid to those sleepy gentlemen for what little they do. This must he reformed. Three or four Insurance offices are quite enough for the million of scattered inhabitants of the Pacific States. A dozen of them may he abolished with great benefit to the community; some one or two have already withdrawn. This change would liherate some fifty men of education, whose business capacity would be of much greater service to the community in other branches of industry, such as manufactures, agriculture, commerce, the fisheries, the forests and the mines. This change would also divert a million or two of dollars to other and more needful industries, whereby a thousand fold more of national capital and employment would he generated than hy the present drowsy system.

The managers of the Builders' Insurance propose, with the co-operation of the people, that this vast monthly stream of wealth shall he arrested and diverted to the aid of home manufactures, to effect a great reform and remove from the people's shoulders the expense of supporting a small army of insurance clerks and agents. The Builders' Insurance Company has passed through its first year (the most trying) with singular success. It has gathered a hundred thousand dollars, paid promptly all its losses, and established a business income of fully twenty thousand dollars a month! This has been done while we were yet but an experiment, and enjoying the confidence of only a portion of the public. We now appeal to the entire people. We ask them to send their insurance business to us on the following conditions, and soon we shall have an income of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS A MONTH, and here is what we shall do with the money:

First, we calculate, from our present experience, that we shall lose by fire and marine disasters half our monthly income (on our first year's experience our "losses" were but one-third of our income.)

Suppose then that our income shall be worked up to one hundred thousand dollars a month, and suppose that we shall pay out losses to the extent of fifty thousand dollars a month, we shall still have fifty thousand dollars a month to bank up, (or half a million a year.) We propose to make two parts of this sum—one part (a quarter of a million a year) to be invested in City Bonds, to protect the assured, and one part (about a quarter of a million a year) we propose to convert into a

MANUFACTURERS' LOAN FUND,

Which shall be lent exclusively to manufacturers on mortgage of their premises and machinery, at as low rate of interest and on as long time as is generally current on real estate.

By the aid of this fund the budding industries of the Pacific States may he nourished into active life; more and varied employments can he originated for the people; immigration may be welcomed and not feared; the farmer will have got a market at his own door for the produce of his land; the manufacturer will find a lively home demand from the farmer for the products of his machines.

All this, good people, can be achieved by your own votes at your own firesides, without the aid of Congress or the Legislature—it is simply to vote that your insurance shall go to the BUILDERS', hy which vote you shall enable us to plant factories all over the country. You shall fill the rivers and harbors with busy ships; you shall send out upon the distant waves fishing expeditions that will hring back wealth to your cities: you shall form a nursery of seamen around your own shores—the ova of a future commerce and a protective navy; you will create the hum of busy workmen in every desirable locality on the Pacific coast; you will hring from neglected fields produce of the utmost value; all of which will most certainly multiply a thousand fold the wealth of the country in which your lot is cast, making a worthy home for yourselves and a future country for your offspring.

People of the Pacific States and Territories! We pledge ourselves to you to effect, with your co-operation, some of those things. We have kept all our pledges so far, and have uttered nothing that was not true. Already have we helped to move the shuttle and the loom, which others, with more means, have passed by and neglected. Already have we helped to build and rig ships in our own dock-yards, and sent them over the wide waves in search of riches for the city. Already have we given many liberal bounties and donations to the deserving institutions of the city. Give your vote to the BUILDERS', and we shall share its profits with every useful charity and every honest industry, and help along every enterprise that promises benefit to the people.

We call for the yeas and nays.

A Sleepy Bride. — The New Orleans Crescent gets the following from one of the Sister of Charity at a hospital in that city:

Sister Mary gave an accounnt of a singular marriage that took place during the mo i in the chapel. Some time ago the newspapers announced that a young man had attempted to commit suicide in town by shooting himself. He was taken to the Hotel Dieu, and it was feared that the wound was mortal, but with the care he received he was out of danger in a few days. The cause of his attempt to destroy himself then became known. He was in love. His innamorata had promised him three times to marry him, and disappointed him every time. The last time was too much, and a bullet, aimed at the heart, was to end his misery. The cruel lady visited him at the hospital, and there she pledged herself to him again. The ceremony was to have taken place at eight o'clock yesterday morning. The lady again failed. The expectant groom was in a wretched state of mind, until he received a message from her that she overslept herself, and would be with him at eleven o'clock. At that hour she was there, and the ceremony took place.

"Only think," said Sister Mary, "of a bride sending word that she had overslept herself!"

MARY ANN LEEDOM, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days; or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant, awarding the care and custody of her daughter Julia to plaintiff, and allowing her to resume her maiden name.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

THE DEW OF EDEN.

LADIES OF CALIFORNIA?—If you will keep your complexions in the freshness, delicacy and beauty of youth, you must use the DEW OF EDEN, for it is the only article extant that will do for those using it all that it purports without injury, as it contains no mineral or poisonous substances whatever. It preserves the skin from the effects of climate and atmospheric changes; prevents the formation of Freckles, Tan, Morphew, Sunburn and Wrinkles. It keeps the skin soft, tender and beautiful; because it is congenial and natural to it, and composed of ingredients that supply to it what time and exposure take too rapidly away. It preserves and restores. It is valuable to the young, but more so to those from whom the stern hand of Time is stealing the treasures of youth; to such, it will actually arrest its depredations and avert its ravages upon the human face divine. It will surely smooth out those lines of care to a great extent, and restore the skin to comparative youth. Used on the hands daily, it preserves them in all fineness of texture and delicacy of early years. It gives a beautiful tint to the nails of the fingers, and keeps them tender and soft. It is not a cosmetic, and must not be used with any kind of paint. A simple powder, however, of harmless nature, may be used without detriment with this protective.

No lady once using the DEW OF EDEN will ever afterward dispense with it from her toilet.

A Healthy Place for Editors. — Richardson, in his late work, thus describes some of the sudden aliments to which Colorado editors were liable:

As in all new mining regions, there was an irrepressible conflict between the industrious sterling citizens and the desperadoes, strengthened by their sympathizers of wealth and position, who formed the connecting link between villainy and respectability. The Rocky Mountain News offended the scoundrels by some comment upon a wanton murder. While the editor, William M. Byers, sat in his office coversing with three pacific strangers from the East, four gamblers rushed in with cocked revolvers and abusive epithets, dragged Byers to a drinking saloon, where, only through the strategy of a friend, he was saved from death. After his escape, the enraged gamblers rode back to the News office and fired several bullets into it.

The establishment was always in a state of armed neutrality. Printers and editors were moving arsenals, with revolvers at their belts and shot-guns standing beside their cases and desks. The typos returned the fire, killing one of the assailants. By this time half a dozen armed citizens reached the scene and chased the flying gamblers through the streets. One of the latter, named Steele, galloping along Blake street, met Thomas W. Pollock, whose horse was also upon a full run. Neither checked his speed. Both fired at the same moment. Pollock was unhurt; Steele fell dead with a charge of buckshot in his brain. Another of the gamblers was captured, and barely escaped hanging; by a close vote in a popular assembly he was permitted to leave the country.

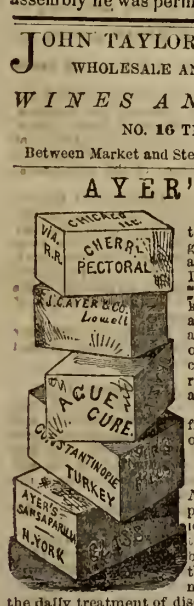
AYER'S PILLS



ARE PARTICULARLY ADAPTED to derangements of the Digestive Apparatus, and diseases arising from Impurity of the Blood. A large part of all the complaints that afflict mankind originate in one of these, and consequently these PILLS are found to cure many varieties of Disease. They are sugar-coated, and hence may be taken readily by the most sensitive and delicate persons.

Subjoined are the statements from some eminent physicians, of their effects in their practice:

AS A FAMILY PHYSIC.

From Dr. E. W. Cartwright, of New Orleans—Your Pills are the prince of purges. Their excellent qualities surpase any cathartic we possess. They are mild, but very certain and effectual in their action on the bowels, which makee them invaluable to us in the daily treatment of disease.

FOR JAUNDICE AND ALL LIVER COMPLAINTS.

From Dr. Theodore Bell, of New York City—Not only are your Pills admirably adapted to their purpose as an aperient, but I find their beneficial effects upon the Liver very marked indeed. They have in my practice proved more effectual for the cure of Bilious Complaints than any one remedy I can mention. I sincerely rejoice that we have at length a purgative which is worthy the confidence of the profession and the people.

DYSPEPSIA—INDIGESTION.

From Dr. Henry J. Knox, of St. Louis—The Pills you were kind enough to send me have been all used in my practice, and have satisfied me that they are truly an extraordinary medicine. So peculiarly are they adapted to the diseases of the human system, that they seem to work upon them alone. I have cured some cases of Dyspepsia and Indigestion with them, which had resisted the other remedies we commonly use. Indeed I have experimentally found them to be effectual in almost all the complaints for which you recommend them.

FOR HEADACHE—SICK HEADACHE—FOUL STOMACH—PILES—DROPSY—PLETHORA—PARALYSIS—FITS—DYSENTERY—DIARRHŒA—RELAXATION, Etc., Etc.

From Dr. Edward Boyd, Baltimore—Dear Dr. Ayer: I cannot answer you what complaints I have cured with your Pills better than to say all that we ever treat with a purgative medicine. I place great dependence on an effectual cathartic in my daily contest with disease, and believe as I do that your Pills afford us the best we have, I of course value them highly.

☞ Most of the Pills in market contain mercury, which although a valuable remedy in skillful hands, is dangerous in a public pill. from the dreadful consequences that frequently follow its incautious use. These contain no mercury or mineral substances whatever.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine everywhere.

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL
ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner property worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.

BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say: "It is, therefore, now the settled law that the municipal lands held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."

Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.
QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.
DR. W. K. DOHERTY,
PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,
Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street, San Francisco.

Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secrecy, and all Sexual Disorders.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self-Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc.; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secrecy.

TO FEMALES.

When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, she should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about her troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful sufferiug and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.

If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.

Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,
W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.
San Francisco, Cal.

SPERMATORRHŒA.

DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs.

This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of Six Cents in Postage stamps for return postage. Address,

INSURANCE.

☞ EDITOR OF THE CALIFORNIAN—SIR—I have read over with attention your commentary of the 18th instant on the downward tendency of the stocks of half a dozen of our "crack" insurance company. You report that their shares have fallen eight to eleven per cent. within the last couple of weeks, and that in most cases the rates quoted are merely nominal: that in fact there are NO BUYERS. This is precisely what I foretold to those gentlemen several months ago when I observed the illiberal and and unbusiness methods they had adopted. Only think of it. Those great Insurance Companies founded on so many hundreds of thousands of "capital," (paper) would cancel people's policies if they presumed to give a portion of their insurance to the Builders' Insurance Co. Yes, indeed! You might insure with Turk, Jew, or Gentile, with New England or Old England, with German, Gaul, or Dane; but if you insured with the BUILDERS your policies with the others were straightway cancelled! And why object to the Builders, gentlemen? You are not called upon to pay their losses; the Builders have to pay their own losses, and have so far paid them promptly. But the Builders are only mechanics—they are not "merchants," and of course unfit to insure anybody.

Ah, gentlemen, I may say, in the words of Oliver Cromwell to the long Parliament of England: "The Lord hath delivered you into my hands."

Observe, Mr. Editor, they decline to make dividends from "prudential motives;" rather prudent, one should say, when they have no profits to divide! Bah! and so all their vaporing and dignity and pretension have come to this: That from gross mismanagement they are losing money and eating up the capital of their stockholders: while some of their labors consist in cancelling policies of their old customers, returning them the premiums paid, which, of course, are carried straight into the "Builders."

Those lights of Insurance Science are fain to be thought the models of Commercial Men—the encouragers of the young enterprise and budding industries of California. Yet the whole city can discern their meanness and incapacity.

I now prophecy and proclaim that half of those pompous Institutions will dissolve and retire from business long before they have their fortunes made; and their existence will be remembered only by the unfortunate Shareholders—an inevitable result of all mean and vicious dealing in the world.

IN THE PROBATE COURT, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.
In the matter of the Estate of JEAN VICTOR SUBERVEILLE, deceased.
On reading and filing the petition of Lucas Poston de Arce, Administrator of the said estate, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of the Administrator to pay the debts, charges and expenses of administration, and that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said deceased for the payment of such debts, charges and expenses, and because after the sale of so much of said estate as shall be necessary to pay such debts, charges and expenses, the residue thereof would be of such a character with reference to its future disposition among the heirs of said deceased as clearly to render it for the best interest of all concerned that the same should be sold, and for other reasons set forth in said petition.
It is ordered that all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court, at the Court room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 25th day of November, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock A. M., of that day, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased as shall be necessary.
And it is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the city and county aforesaid.
Done in open Court this 25th day of October, A. D 1867.

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.
In the matter of the Estate of HENRY BENTZ, deceased.
Order to show cause why order of sale of real estate should not be made.
It appearing to the said Court, by the petition this day presented and filed by William A. Quarles, the Administrator of the estate left unadministered of Henry Bentz, deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell some portion of the real estate, to pay the debts, expenses and charges of the administration.
It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Probate Court on TUESDAY, the 26th day of November, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Court room of said Probate Court, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, as shall be necessary.
And that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.
Dated October 24th, 1867,

Obituary Literature.

The nonsense written concerning the dead is generally considered exempt from criticism, though occasionally some hard-hearted materialist holds up to ridicule the epitaphs inscribed on tombstones. Far be it from us to criticise the uncouth rhyme in which a brother pays an ungrammatical tribute to a dead sister, or the "piece" which a daughter writes for the papers, setting forth the many virtues of her dead father. We would not do this. But we object to the "friend of the family" who seizes the opportunity afforded him by a death to rush into print. One of these literary ghouls was allowed to gnsh in the Bulletin one day this week. He saw two funerals in one day. He says:

The only remarkable features about these two incidents are the points of analogy and contrast which they suggest. In the one case the remains were those of a man sixty-five years of age, born across the seas, while in the other case the deceased was only five years of age, and a native of California.

Then he tells us that one had enjoyed much experience, and the other hadn't, etc., etc. He then states that—

The little child also, fresh from the Sunday School, with life all before him, felt no desire to have that life continued, but expressed his wish by singing, just before his final departure, "I want to be an angel;" and a convoy of those spirit messengers bore him away to the evergreen shore where the angels dwell.

We consider this not only very silly, but very wicked. The writer of this stuff knows very well that the child fresh from the Sunday School did not wish to die and did not sing "I want to be an angel," just before his final departure. This sentimental ghoul who gloats over these two death-beds and "does them up" for the Bulletin, winds up as follows:

The busy throng will give to these incidents a passing thought, and then go surging on as unconcerned as ever.

Why should not the busy throng continue to surge! These incidents (a euphemism for funerals) happen every day, and if the busy throng ceased surging on each occasion, business would be put a stop to. Seriously speaking, these silly anonymous obituary notices can afford but little satisfaction to either the relatives of the deceased or the public, however much they may gratify the conceit of the writer.

Plump Women.

The New York Gazette concludes an editorial on the resources of the country thus:

This country has no greater want, at the present time, than of plump girls and plump women. Let us have them plump and healthy whether they know anything or not. We can teach their children what they don't know, if necessary; by all means, let us have blooming, rosy, solid women. The Pacific Railroad is not half as important to the prosperity of this country as the aggregate avordupois of its women. The female sex of America ought to weigh at least half again as much as it does now.

That's sensible. It is so easy, too, to fatten a woman, just as easy as to fatten a chicken. Women cannot expect to get fat on pickles, apple sass and garden stuff. They won't fatten while they bolt every mouthful of food as if it were a pill, and consider the time spent in eating time mis-spent. There is something radically wrong in the human being, man or woman, who has no respect for the institution of dinner. Let dinner become a more honored meal throughout the United States, and the women will become plump. Dinners are the cause of the plumpness of the English women. They don't hurry through that respectable meal in fifteen minutes, but spend an hour or an hour and a half at the dinner table, and consider the time thus spent the most pleasant in the day. Professor Blot is engaged in a good missionary labor, he is teaching American women how to cook their food, the next thing is to teach them how to eat it. It is all affectation and snobbishness to sneer at a man who owns that he thinks a great deal of his dinner, to tell him he is a gourmand, makes a god of his belly, etc. Dinners and suppers are honorable institutions, many of the most important events in the world's history have been connected with dinner, and, with all reverence he it said, the great sacrament of the Christian church is the commemoration of a supper.

An "Episcopal Bishop."

The Call heads a paragraph in its column of foreign news, "What an Episcopal Bishop thinks of Benevolent Societies." "Episcopal Bishop" is good—a better expression than "female woman."

Fitz Smythe's Labors.

We rather like Fitz Smythe, he is an agreeable fool, we should not like to get him discharged from his position as local items on the Alta and force him to go into a cheap John auction store. We think however that the chapter on natural history which he published in the Alta one day this week is an imposition both on the proprietors of the paper and the public. Fitz Smythe advertises the business of a Chinese washerman, by writing an account of the performance of a squirrel which the aforesaid washerman has in his window, and advertises the squirrel as being for sale at the price of twenty dollars. He also states that he watched this squirrel for an hour. Is Fitz Smythe paid a princely salary by the proprietors of the Alta for watching squirrels in the windows of Chinese wash houses an hour at a time? The next remarkable animal Fitz Smythe observed was a dog with a cast in his eye, on Davis street, he then examined a horse's tail, and found that it stuck up like that of an English carriage horse—and so he goes on driveling. Is this the sort of thing that the subscribers for the Alta expect to read for local news? Fitz Smythe should be suppressed.

Christianity Unhealthy in the Sandwich Islands.

Rev. Mr. Hine, a Methodist missionary, has written a book on his experience in Oregon, the Sandwich Islands and China, says an exchange—in which he declares that the efforts to civilize and Christianize the natives of the Sandwich Islands have resulted in the extermination of four-fifths of the natives. He says that he doubts if ever yet a single native has been made truly and understandingly a Christian.

Mr. Hine speaks very plainly of Christianity as an exterminating agency. There is very little doubt, however, that the "Christianity" of the natives of the Sandwich Islands is not so respectable a religion as the heathen one which they formerly believed in. Mr. Hine is, however, a little too hard on Christianity when he charges it with being the cause of the extermination of four-fifths of the natives. Whisky and other causes have quite as much to do with it as Christianity.

In Memoriam.

DEATH OF AN OLD PAINTER.—John Flint, probably the oldest compositor actively engaged in printing, on this coast, died in this city yesterday. He was well known in California and British Columbia, and was respected by all who knew him; he was a native of London, and was over fifty-five years of age. His funeral will take place to-morrow at 1 o'clock, and will be conducted by the Eureka Typographical Union.—Bulletin, October 26th.

Death with his cruel dart struck Flint,
But baffled was his ire,
His steel brought forth th' immortal spark,
He could not quench that fire;
Th' immortal soul straight sped to heaven,
A spark from heaven sent,
The lifeless flint till the Last Day
Lies in earth's prison pent.

A Sweet Thing in Programmes.

An American has invented a new style of newspaper for the French theatres. The programme, names of artists, etc., is printed upon an agreeable sheet, a paste mixture, made of sugar, chocolate, etc.; so that the programme can be eaten. In the case of a synopsis of the incidents in each act being published it would be amusing to see the audience immediately on the fall of the drop curtain on the first act proceed to devour an inch or two of their programmes. It is to be feared that some greedy little boys and girls will eat up their programmes before the rising of the curtain. We are not quite sure whether Leslie, Raynor and Smith intend to adopt this new style of programme at their New Temple of Music, but are sure that if they do, they will find it rather an expensive experiment. The ladies of San Francisco have a large number of sweet teeth in their heads, and would eat up an alarming number of programmes.

The Fenian Alta.

Granny Alta has turned Fenian. She chuckles over the fact that an Indian Chief has offered to join the "Fenian army" with two hundred braves, and says:

For the sake of the old grudge, and the novelty of the thing, we hope to hear of the landing of the Fenian Indian contingent.

It will be a great pity if the Indians do not land in Ireland, and scalp a few women and children just to gratify the Alta's old grudge, and "for the novelty of the thing."

An Important Question Settled.

Yesterday's Alta contains an editorial headed, "Shall we annex Greece?" This is an important question. Shall we annex Greece? Much discussion might have been caused by the proposition of this question, a revolution might have occurred, but the country is now safe. The Alta answers the question. It says no, we shan't annex Greece. So we won't annex.

The Fog Whistle.

Some of the city papers have been "blowing" considerably about the new fog whistle which makes a more diabolical noise than the Mint whistle. The tone of this new whistle may be aptly compared to the sound emitted by a young bull calf in the agony of death from strangulation. TREM.

RECOLLECTIONS OF THE WAR.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

A PRISONER'S STORY—IN THE LIBBEY—AND THE ESCAPE FROM IT.

DURING the early part of the year 1864, I enjoyed a brief leave of absence at the North; and in due course of time it came to an end, and I took my way back to the Department of the Gulf. Taking passage at New York in the steamer Cahawba for New Orleans, I found a goodly number of cabin-passengers aboard, with some hundred soldiers forward. Most of the former were officers, returning like myself from brief leaves of absence, or sick-leaves.

There were good talkers aboard, and story and conversation flowed in an unbroken stream. The favorite hour of the day was just after dinner, when everybody sought the shade of the awning on the deck; and here, on camp-stools, or lying lazily on blankets brought up from below, we smoked and talked, speculating much upon the future of the war, and the experiences that were before us, but giving more time to those which were already woven into the tissue of our lives. And here was given the narrative of Captain B. F. Porter, of the New Jersey volunteer cavalry, of his remarkable escape from the Libbey. Not long previous to this time, the wonderful deliverance of Colonel Straight and thirty or more of his fellow-sufferers from that den of horrors, by the secret excavation of a tunnel under the walls of the prison, had filled the northern journals, and became the theme of every little gathering; and it was still fresh enough in our minds to occupy much of our attention on board the Cahawba.

"It's a very pretty story," said a lieutenant of the group—a new addition to General Banks' command, whose brilliant shoulder-straps were to receive a smoky christening up Red River—"a very pretty story, gentlemen, but awfully exaggerated. These special war-correspondents are terrible liars."

A grave, quiet young man, of some twenty-four years, sat on a camp-stool near this speaker, reading a novel. He wore the straps of a cavalry-captain, and although he had talked with most of us casually since we left New York, few of us knew his name, none of us his story. As he heard the lieutenant's remark, he lifted a pair of keen blue eyes from the book he was reading, and said:

"Excuse me, sir, if I contradict you; but I can assure you there is no exaggeration in the newspaper accounts of that affair. As far as they go, they are perfectly truthful; but they do not tell more than half the story."

He spoke in that decided manner which intimated that his knowledge came from elsewhere than the columns of the papers; and it was for the purpose of drawing him out, that somebody suggested:

"Your way of speaking leads us to infer that you speak from experience?"

"As I do," was the ready answer. "I have lately escaped from the Libbey prison, after seven months' confinement; and I am the first man who succeeded in escaping."

Nothing more than these words was wanted to draw us all in an eager circle around him, and to cause every man of us to solicit his story. He told it at once, in a plain, off-hand way, with no attempt at ornament or effect; and as it is one of those narratives not easily forgotten, I shall be able to repeat it as faithfully as though three years had not passed since I heard it.

Early in the morning of June 14th, the day of the assault on Port Hudson, I was sent out with my company up the Jackson road, to watch for the appearance of the rebel cavalry: it being expected that they would take advantage of the fight inside to make a dash at our lines. "Go carefully, captain," said the colonel, "for a few miles; and if you discover any number of the enemy, return directly and report to me." I am on my way back to him now, after seven months' absence, to report that after proceeding about two miles beyond the lines, I was suddenly surrounded by a whole battalion of rebel guerrillas, who dashed out of the woods on each side of the road, and cut off our escape almost before we knew of their presence. I had nothing to do but surrender, which I did with a bad grace and heavy heart. We were all disarmed and put into the column near the rear of it; and then the guerrillas pushed right up to our lines, till we were actually in sight of the house that the general occupied as headquarters. How much further they might have gone, I don't know, but the appearance of an infantry brigade on the march alarmed them, and the leader gave the order to withdraw. This happened before daylight; and the noise of the fight over the left had grown louder and louder, and for several hours I heard a heavy cannonade between the lines. Gaining a position about half a mile back, the leader of this troop concealed them in the woods, and sent out a select squad to reconnoiter. "Fetch in two or three prisoners," he said; "and find out how the day is going." Then turning round to me, he questioned me sharply, trying to get information about our army and our plans; but I told him nothing more than my name and regiment. When he saw that I was cautious, he attempted to win my confidence, saying:

"Come, cap—you might as well tell. Maybe we won't send you to Richmond, if you do. In less than two weeks Joe Johnstone will be down here from Mississippi with an army, and Banks will be completely surrounded. There isn't a man of your army that will get home any other way than through Richmond. So tell me what you know."

I only answered that I had been in the service two years, and that if he mistook me for a greenhorn, that would not make me one. He laughed, and replied:

"Well—you are a good 'un! Hope your pluck will hold out good, for I guess you've got pretty hard times before you."

I knew that well enough; and very dreary thoughts of what my new experience was likely to be came over me as I sat on the grass, waiting to be carried into the enemy's lines, where there could be no hope of deliverance short of the long and tedious process of exchange. But I was not despondent. It is part of my creed that a soldier has no business to put away the present and its duties, until he is flat on his back with a mortal wound. And I was not long in withdrawing my thoughts from the unpleasantness of my situation, and devoting them to the immediate exigency of the hour, I had not been seached yet; I well knew that I should be; and I knew, too, that to a prisoner in rebel hands, nothing was quite as valuable as the command of a little money. I had three double-eagles in my pocket, and a few greenbacks. The latter I left where they were, to avoid suspicion; and pretending to be sleepy, I stretched myself at full length upon the grass, and putting my hands inside my blouse to escape observation, I slit the lining with my knife, exactly under the top button, and putting one of the pieces in, fastened the edges with a pin. I concealed the other two in the same way; and it was a very timely conccalment. I had hardly completed it when I was put in line with my company, and each of us was thoroughly searched. Every article in my pockets was taken, and my captors felt all over my blouse for secret depositories; but the buttons effectually hid the gold, and it escaped discovery. To those three golden pieces, and to the forethought that suggested their concealment, I was finally indebted for my escape.

In half an hour the scouts returned, bringing no prisoners, but reporting that the assault was probably a failure. One of them who wore a blue blouse had left his horse with his comrades, and entered our lines far enough to meet some of the wounded on their way down from the front, who gave him an account of what they had seen. With that, we were ordered to horse, and rode rapidly with our captors to Jackson, where we found something like a brigade of guerrillas. That night I tasted the first sweets of confinement in an old shed, with a heap of cotton for a couch. A tall Mississippian guarded the door with a carbine. He informed me that he guessed I was a "good un!" but told me that he would have to shoot me if I tried to escape. He talked emphatically, through a long nose, and I believed him, and went to sleep. For the time, I put away all thoughts of escape, and resolved to await the developments of the future.

I shall not describe the incidents of my trip to Richmond; it would make a long story by itself, and has nothing to do with my escape. I remember it as a miserable journey, over rough railroads, at a tedious rate of speed, the prisoners for the most part being shut up in close and filthy cattle cars. We traversed the whole of Mississippi, most of Tennessee, and a part of North Carolina and Virginia. At many of the stations great crowds of people gathered about us, just as they would have attended a show of wild beasts, and many of them hooted us, and called us insulting names. Then, too, I remember more than one instance in which the better side of human nature showed itself, and when food and water were given us by some kind hand. I believe we had a good dinner to-day, gentlemen; but I assure you I did not relish it half as much as a piece of fresh cornbread which an old negro-woman gave me one hungry morning at Lynchburg.

It was quite two weeks from the day of my capture before we reached Richmond. It was not a very hopeful time to us as we marched through the streets of the rebel capital. The city was not beleagured then; it was upon the eve of the battle of Gettysburg, and some millions of hearts at the North would have beat more quietly could they have been assured of the safety of Washington, Baltimore and Philadelphia. Taking into consideration the fact that no help was at present to be expected from the army of the Potomac, and that months might elapse before another investment of Richmond, there seemed not the faintest chance of escape. Once in the Libbey, I thought I should be as effectually buried from home and friend, for long months, possibly years, as though the grave had closed over me. And if my hopeful heart took any encouragement from the very distant prospect of release by exchange, provided I should escape the horrors of disease and starvation, that was certainly a poor enough encouragement.

I was separated from my men, and taken directly to the old tobacco-warehouse, the cruel sepulchre of so many hopes; and, as the great doors closed behind me with a loud clang, I thought again of the lines from Dante,

"Who enter here must leave all hope behind."

There were at this time almost two hundred Union officers within its walls, of every grade, from brigadier general down. They had been sent here from every part of the military situation, and represented every Northern State, and all arms of the service, and had collectively fought in the greatest battles of the war. Those of them who are best known to the public, were General Neal Dow, Colonel Straight, and Lieutenant Colonel Irvine. We were confined in large rooms up stairs, with guards in both halls, guards outside, and a regular visit and roll-call twice a day from the commandant. I was assigned to one of the rooms; and after the key was turned on me and the bolts shot, I began an experience of seven months which I hope never to repeat. What I saw and heard in that place would fill a book, and I shall not pretend to give you a minute history of it all. That I suffered, I need not say; no man was ever committed to that place who did not suffer keenly. Bad food, and little of it, bad air, filth and vermin, were not exactly calculated to make me happy, nor was the constant fear of pestilence and disease. But it is a fact that men become so accustomed to a standing misery as to derive some consolation out of it; and I believe that we found a little relief in our captivity from our friendship, which grew up within those dreary walls into something of real strength and value. I have no wish now to devote my time to a detailed account of our miseries and sufferings in the Libbey; we had our full share, God knows! But that story has been told often, and is one that I don't care to dwell very particularly upon.

During the first few months of my imprisonement, there was very little whispering among us on the subject of our escape. The season progressed, and when General Meade withdrew from the Mine Run, we understood that there was to be no investment of Richmond that winter; and understanding that, it seemed as though our Government might effect an exchange. At this time "exchange" was the principal subject talked of among us. We speculated upon it, over our miserable rations, some of us declaring that we would be dining at Willard's in less than a month, and others growling at the war officers as only men inside of Libbey prison could growl.

It was in January, I think, that a ray of hope came to us, in the special exchange of Lieutenant Colonel Irvine. It was very unexpected to him, as well as to all of us, and happened in a queer way. As I understood the story, John Morgan's adjutant general, who was captured in Kentucky some time before, and who was well-known to the officials at Washington as a man of sterling integrity, had been released from the Old Capitol Prison, and sent to Richmond on his word of honor that he would procure the release of an Union officer of like rank from the Libbey. He discharged his obligation by getting Lieutenant Colonel Irvine freed; and when the door was opened one morning, and this officer called for, with the information that he had been exchanged, and was to go to Washington immediately, we were filled with astonishment and hope. We crowded round him and wrung his hands heartily, congratulating him on his good fortune, and bidding him not to forget us.

"You may be sure I will not," the good-hearted and brave man replied to us, over and over again. "I'll not let them alone in Washington till they do something for you. Depend upon hearing from me."

I know he was as good as his word. After he reached Washington and reported to Secretary Stanton, he was made a special agent to arrange exchanges, if possible; but some fatality seemed to shroud the subject at that time. I knew the colonel labored manfully for us, and traveled between Washington and City Point several times to effect our release; and at last, convinced that further effort at that inauspicious time would be useless, he sat down at the Point to write us a few lines of regret and encouragement. He told us what he had tried to do, and how impossible it was then to arrange the matter; and in conclusion bade us be hopeful and await "the logic of accomplished events."

We were keenly disappointed at this result, having flattered ourselves that the prospect of immediate liberation was excellent; but it is well for us that we learned, as soon as we did, that we must not put great faith in the ability of the Government to help us out. After this, in the darkness of cold winter nights, when we lay shivering on the cold floor, sustaining our drooping spirits with what fortitude we could summon, we began to whisper together about the chances of escape, and to watch narrowly by day for some way to accomplish it. Our wits were sharpened by hunger and suffering, and still more by that yearning for liberty which is all in all to the poor prisoner; and I cannot think of a plan that was not suggested before one was finally determined upon. We went to work, patiently and determined, working with the utmost secrecy, and resolved in the face of difficulties which to any person not actually a prisoner, would have seemed insuperable, to escape at all hazards.

From the first moment when it became certain that the subject of exchange was to be indefinitely postponed, I resolved with the others that I would escape; but I soon discovered that their plan could not be mine. Long before I saw the outside of the prison, the famous underground tunnel was commenced; in fact, I worked at it frequently at night, willing to give my companions the benefit of my hands while I stayed though the tunnel would not benefit me. To go back a little, and to tell something which I had overlooked, I had received a wound in the leg from a carbine ball, at the time of my capture, which was so slight as to give me no trouble until my confinement. Here something aggravated it—bad air or water, perhaps, or the confinement itself—and it became sore and inflamed. This lasted for some months, and then it grew better; but as the tunnel approached completion, I realized that I was not vigorous enough to take my chances with the others in the wild flight which they meditated, and that I should surely lag behind, and be picked up by the cavalry that would scour the country. My only hope, I thought was to get outside long enough before the general alarm was given to obtain a good start, by which I hoped to be able to reach our lines near Yorktown. And this I concluded I could best do by a disguise. There could of course be no delay when the tunnel should be done, for the hazard of discovery was serious, and was increasing daily; so after consulting with several of the officers, I resolved to try my luck alone, several days before they would be ready for their great attempt.

I was favored by the hope of assistance from an unexpected source, which came to me in a very strange way. I was standing by the grated window, one day, looking out into the yard, when a lady passed on the other side of the way, followed by a negro. She saw me at the window, and with a quick motion of her hand she put aside her shawl, showing me a small Union flag in the bosom of her dress, and instantly covered it again. In less than a week, however, I saw the same negro who followed the lady. He was allowed to come in among us to sell some fruit; and after a few moments he passed near me, and tossed me a large sweet potato, with a knowing look which I did not fail to comprehend. After the rebel guard had left the room, I examined the potato, and took from the center of it, where it lay in a little cavity, a small folded paper. That paper bore the name of the lady whom I had seen from the grates, and contained minute directions for finding her house; and addressing me as "the unknown Union officer," promised that if I could get out of the prison and come to her, she would conceal me faithfully until I could make good my escape.

This was a ray of hope which lent wonderful encouragement to me. In view of the condition of my leg, it seemed really providential; and I went to work, systematically and with energy, and yet with the caution that there was a second nature to us, to devise a successful escape. My plan was simply to collect together articles enough to make the uniform of a rebel soldier, and to put them on and wear them quietly out of the prison! It was the simplest plan that was suggested to me, and probably the best. At all events, it succeeded, as my presence here to-day bears witness.

It was not so difficult to obtain this kind of clothing as might be supposed. Most of our officers had one or two garments of it which they had purchased from the negroes and soldiers to whom they had access; and as cold weather came on, they could do so without suspicion and they were not interfered with in doing so. I made my plan known to a good number of the officers, and with their assistance soon had the coveted disguise stowed away behind the bricks at the corner of the wall. I was troubled for some time to get a gray cap; but that I obtained of one of the guard, with the help of one of my cherished gold pieces. Next I bought a razor, and a pair of scissors; and with my preparations as nearly made as they could be, I waited in feverish impatience for the morning which I had selected for the trial of my attempt. I hardly dared to think of it, or to weigh the chances of success and failure. The difficulties seemed so decidedly against me that I could not look them in the face; but hoping and praying for deliverance, I lay down, with the bundle of clothing under my head, and tried to sleep. I think I was awake the greater part of the night; I was certainly awake long before daylight. There was not a soul stirring in the prison save the guards, who tramped back and forth heavily in the halls, above and below, when I went to the window, and with the help of a little water which was left in my can, and trusting a great deal to the sense of feeling, shaved the long drooping moustache and luxuriant beard which my seven months' confinement had given me. Next I took the scissors and carefully sheared my hair, almost as close as a convict's; and then I dyed my eyebrows to blackness with the ink. After this, I put on my gray suit, buttoned the coat tight up to my chin, that I might look something like an orderly without arms, and then waited patiently near the door. In about an hour the morning allowance of food was brought in to be doled out to us, and this was the moment which I had decided to seize. I walked straight out of the door, and passed the guard in the hall, carrying his musket at a right-shoulder shift. I walked by him with a firm step; he looked at me carelessly, and said not a word. I descended the stairs, and passed anothe guard in the lower hall, in the same way. Acting the exact pursuance of the plan I had laid out, I went into the prison-office at the end of the hall, and asked the clerk the time.

"Pretty near seven," he replied, looking at his watch and then indifferently at me.

I saw he did not know me; but it was with some difficulty that I succeeded in keeping the discovery out of my face when I recognized, in this same clerk, an old friend whose acquaintance with me dated back before the war, and who left a situation in a wholesale house in New York to enter the civil service of the Confederacy. But I was cool; and as I saw the perfection of my disguise, I grew confident. From the office, I walked to the door; and here I met Major Turner, the commandant, just entering. I saluted him promptly, and walked out between the muskets that guarded the door, and in two minutes had turned corners enough to free me from the sight of the Libbey, and to give me a sense of freedom so delicious, so joyful, that I will not attempt to describe it. I hurried along the streets, mentully thanking God for my freedom, and praying for complete deliverance, and with no other thought than to get outside the city as fast as possible, and entirely forgetting, for the time, the condition of my leg. I hurried along, and had soon reached a negro quarter near the eastern outskirts of the city. I stopped to talk with one of the negroes, and feeling sure that there was no necessity for disguise, I frankly told him who I was, and asked his assistance.

"You'll nebber get out dis way, sah," he said, gravely shaking his head. "De rebels hab all de roads up heah, and dey'll kotch you, sure. Come and hide here wid me, and I'll clar you 'fore long."

I thanked him, but told him that I was bound to try; and try I did, and proved the truth of his words. Had I been a little less circumspect about my reconnoitering, I might not have met you here to day, After half a mile's careful progress on one of the roads, I discovered a mounted picket patrolling across it a short distance ahead. I tried two others with the same result, and then sat down on some abandoned earthworks to reflect. My leg was growing painful, and I was surrounded with enemies. I had not the strength nor endurance, after my long imprisonement, necessary to lurk in the woods, and travel blindly about at night, evading the rebel pickets and patrols; and to go forward under these circumstances could result in nothing but capture. I decided that there was nothing left for me to do but to return to Richmond immediately, and seek the concealment offered me by my unknown friend. I did it; but I never yet made a resolution so unwillingly as this, by which I voluntarily placed myself again in the capital of my enemies. And as the sequel proved, I did the very best for myself that I could have done

I found the house of the lady with little difficulty, and was welcomed by her in a way which left me no doubt of her sincerity, and her fidelity to the Union cause. For the next month, that noble woman concealed me, watched over my safety, and at last made my escape sure. She did it all without hope of reward, for pure love of the cause and its soldiers; but I hope some day to meet her where I can testify my gratitude in a more substantial manner than by thanks. Her house was the headquarters of a branch organization of a loyal league, which she informed me embraced the names of several thousands in Richmond. I know it to be a fact that these men had arms concealed in different cellars and garrets in the city; and in the previous Spring, during the battle of Chancellorsville, when Stoneman was raiding down toward the city with his heavy cavalry columns, they only waited the certainty of his coming to rise, arm themselves, open the doors of the prisons, and take possession of the city for him. And strange as it may seem, during my sojourn at this house I was introduced to one of its visitors, a man in thorough sympathy with the national cause, who was a high official in one of the Confederate bureaus; and at his suggestion, I accompanied him one day, riding a horse which he provided me, as his orderly, when he went, in company with a board of examination and several generals, to inspect all the defences of the city! The information which I acquired during that day's ride I reduced to writing, making plans from memory of the most important works; and these I subsequently delivered to Secretary Stanton, at Washington.

After I had been a week in the house of my fast friend, the widow, I grew perfectly confident of her good faith, and tried to wait patiently for my final deliverance. Her plan of escape satisfied me well, and I was content to wait till it could be carried out. She designed to get me a place as driver of one of the wagons of a great forage and supply train which was to leave the city in a few days for Northumberland county; and, as many of her friends were interested with her, she thought there could be little doubt of her success. The chief difficulty was with the passport; but that she hoped to arrange, with a little management. She reported to me everything that could be gathered from around the prison, and I learned that after some excitement and considerable swearing, caused by the discovery of my escape, several squads of cavalry had been sent out on the north and east roads, and that they had all returned without an item of intelligence concerning me. I could reasonably suspect that upon this the rebels might be quite certain that I was still in the city; and thereafter the utmost care was taken to prevent discovery. I only went out after nightfall, and even then always in my suit of gray, and in company with some one who knew the city thoroughly.

One morning the widow brought me the gratifying intelligence which filled the city with surprise, and some thousands of hearts in it with secret exultation, of the escape of Colonel Straight and his companions through the tunnel. That was an exciting time in Richmond, and much of the excitement came to the house where I was concealed. The near approach of Colonel Dahlgren and his command raised the wildest apprehensions on the part of the rebels, and I saw not a few Unionists who predicted that the stars and stripes would wave over the city before the expiration of twenty-four hours. The prophecy was false; but I believe a little more system in this advance, and a menace from two or three more columns on different roads, at this time, would have made the way for one of them inside, and secured the escape of all of us. As it was, the rebel cavalry chased the fugitives hotly over the peninsula, and many were captured and returned to their old hateful quarters; and others succeeded, by herculean exertions and terrible fatigue and exposure, in reaching the relief parties that were sent out from Fortress Monroe at the first intimation of their escape. I was more than ever convinced that I had acted wisely in not casting my lot with them. I knew now, if I did not before, that I should have been hunted down among the first. After these occurrences, the excitement ran so high in the city, and the scrutiny became so rigid, that my friends declared to me that I must defer all thoughts of getting away until the departure of another train; and this I reluctantly, and still wisely, consented to do.

But at last the long-expected day came; and furnished with a passport which bore the name of Moses Parish, (a real person, who was unable to go with the train on account of sickness, and whom I was to personate.) I bade farewell to my kind deliverer, and walked over to the rendezvous with a bold air. The officer in command of the train looked at my passport and then very closely at my face; and believing that if I could pass safely through this ordeal, my escape would be assured, I took courage, and prepared for a catechism.

"I don't know you, my man," he said. "How long have you been in Richmond?"

"Seven months," I replied, telling him the exact truth that time.

"How did you get here?"

"Through the lines. 'Listed in the Yankee army, and deserted after Chancellorsville."

"Where did you enlist?"

"Baltimore."

"Have you lived there!"

"All my life," said I, knowing that I could satisfy him that I knew all about Baltimore, if he would give me a chance.

"Ho--you have, have you? We'll see about that. Now, my fine fellow, I happen to be a Baltimorean myself, and I think you've been lying to me. If you have, I'll find it out; and he proceeded to question me closely about the streets, squares, railroad depots and public buildings of Baltimore; all of which I answered satisfactorily.

"Well," he said, looking me right in the eyes, "you do seem to know Baltimore pretty well. Get up on your wagon-box, and we'll see about you."

I knew he had some suspicion of me, and prepared myself to meet him in whatever shape he came. We left the city, a great empty train of half a mile in length, with several companies of cavalry as escort, and wound along slowly towards the southern Potomac. There was incident and excitement enough happened every day while I stayed with this train to make a story of itself; but there was nothing more which brought me into danger until we reached the Pamunkey. The water was high, and the whole train crossd over on boats. I was leaning on the rail, looking into the water, when a resounding slap fell on my shoulder, and a loud voice rang out, close to my ear:

"Halloo, Porter! who'd have thought to see you here!"

Now I had forethought enough to provide in advance for just such a contigency as this. Before I left Richmond, for two weeks, the widow and her friends had called me nothing but Moses Parish, in order to familiarize me with the name; and I had resolved that until all danger was past, I would never betray the slightest recognition upon the utterance of my own name. I turned now, slowly and deliberately, and faced my kind friend, the train-master.

"That's not my name, sir," I said; "but I'm on hand for duty."

"The d—l it isn't! and the d—l you are!" he said, snappishly. "Do you mean to tell me that your name is not Captain Porter, of the Yankee army—the man who escaped from Richmond the other day?"

"No, sir, it is not." And I burst out into a loud laugh.

"Well, what is it?"

"Moses Parish, lately from Baltimore, and—"

"There, there, enough of that infernal stuff! If you're not a knave, then I'm a fool; we'll try to find out which, when we get back to Richmond."

But that opportunity the excellent lieutenant never had; and I suspect that he thought, when he took his loaded train back without me, that he had not overrated his acuteness.

We reached the neighborhood of the Potomac, and watching my opportunity, I detached a mule from the wagon I drove, and rode him to the river as fast as I could make him go. Here I found a boy with a boat, and easily hired him to take me across; and I am not ashamed to say that when I reached the opposite shore, I fell down prostrate on the sand, and catching up great handsful of it, shouted aloud, "Maryland, my Maryland!" I easily found one of our cavalry camps in this vicinity, and by the help I received there, was able to reach Washington in a few hours; and I had not been in the city half a day before I was closeted with the Secretary of War, giving him a full account of my experience. I have reason to know that I gave him information which was of great importance to the Army of the Potomac, and to the country.

SHARK CATCHING.

THE Rocky Point correspondent of the Springfield Republican gives a humorous account of shark fishing in Narragansett Bay, incidentally introducing George Dawson, a great sportsman of Albany:

Those who know this gentleman, are aware of his weakness for angling. All through the Adirondack regions the trout know his tread upon the banks of lake and stream, and jump exclusively at his fly. Wherever salmon swims or musculonge sweeps, there walks George Dawson successfully demanding tribute of the subject waters. Now Mr. Dawson, with all his accomplishments and exploits, had not, previous to his visit to Rocky Point, caught a shark. He longed to catch a shark. For one I was determined that such ambition should be gratified. I had familiarized myself with the resources of Rocky Point. I knew its private park of sharks, perfectly. We stake them here as they do oysters; and one afternoon the beautiful yacht Lula, Capt. Sibley—Chubb, the first mate having been armed with a hatchet—dropped anchor off my private stake, at Conninicut Point. The shark lines were pulled out, Mr. Dawson was instructed in the art of throwing the bob, and the solemnities were begun.

Now it must be remembered that in shark fishing one is quite apt to get hold of a creature whose weight and style of action render single handed conflict inconvenient. So, when a large shark is hooked, two or three fellows turn to and help get him in. But Mr. Dawson proposed to take his own sharks. Suddenly, after numberless bootless tossings of the float, Mr. Dawson saw it disappear from his excited vision. It had gone under; and then he bent himself to the task of pulling in the lively fellow for whom he had been waiting. I think I never witnessed a more exciting scene. Fancy an elderly gentleman at one end of a long clothes line, and a fish seven feet long at the other, in the full vigor of its maturing life, the question being whether said gentleman should be pulled into the water, or the fish should be pulled into the boat. Fancy this fish plowing slowly through the water toward the boat, under gentle but persistent compulsion, lashing the surface into spray, and turning over and over like the screw of an ocean propeller. Fancy all of us offering assistance which was indignantly refused. "Let go of my line!" "Don't touch me;" "Keep off; keep your distance." These were the frantic exclamations of one who, even in a closely contested New York election, is radiant like a Summer sun, set forth with something sweeter than repose. At last the fish was at the side of the boat. Mr. Dawson had raised the tip of the creature's nose into view above the rail, and there he stuck. Still he refused assistance. One more effort and the whole head was in view. Then the gentleman from Albany called up his reserves, and with one grand effort the shark was pulled in. An instant later Mr. Dawson stood on the forwurd deck, partly to contemplate his triumph at leisure and partly to get out of the way of the shark's tail. It was while standing there, Chubb in the meantime hammering away with a hatchet upon what was supposed to contain the creature's brain, that Mr. Dawson, elevated by his success and contemptuous of his less fortunate companions, exclamed: "Strange that men unaccustomed to fishing will venture out on expeditions of this character!"

LITERARY GLEANINGS.

THE "BROADWAY."

THE second number of this new magazine—the number for October—has made its appearance. The "international" character announced as its chief features, is not impartially preserved, the English contributors furnishing about seven-eights of the reading matter. The contents consist of four fresh chapters of "Brakespeare," by the author of "Guy Livingstone;" a light arricle on "Croquet," by W. S. Gilbert, with six clever illustrations; "Mrs. Brown on Periodical Literature," by Arthur Sketchley; four new chapters of "Second Thoughts," by F. C. Burnand, occupying four pages—a chapter to a page; "Nicholas at the Exposition;" "Amantium Iræ," a copy of very commou-place verses, by I. Ashby Sterry; "Couleur de Rose," by Mrs. J. H. Riddell; "The Water Link of Europe and America," by Rev. C. W. Denison; "Anonymous Humbug," by John Hollinshead; "Holland House," by Rev. J. C. M. Bellew; and "Mary O'Mara," a song, by Samuel Lover, of the most hacknied type of feeble sentimentality. "Brakespeare" is located iu England and France during the continental wars waged by Edward III. and the Black Prince, and the well known characteristics of its author crop out in every paragraph. The attempt to make the characters discourse in the language of the time, results in a literal sprinkling of those stilted forms of expression employed by a certain class of playwrights to give a savor of antiqiquity to the dialogue of their more tragic characters, and which no human being ever made use of off the stage. No salutations are made, or questions asked, in any less stately fashion than "We give thee good morrow, fair son," "whither are ye faring forth?" etc. The hero, who is of course of the Admirable Crichton order, irresistible in war and love, never says "I wonder," or "I know," but always, "I marvel" or "I wish;" and where "Guy Livingstone," or any other modern beau sabreur would possibly indulge in profanity and bid an adversary "Go to —," the "Free Lance" of the present story simply bids him "Go to!" stopping short of the blank. Of the other articles, "Couleur de Rose" is the best. Here is a specimen:

Here "Coulenr de Rose" tastes dead like Cliequot a week uncorked—it is useless as a foreign delicacy, it is unavailable as an English necessary. The thing is very well in its own country, as a light meagre way of expressiug the self-delusious of a different race; but in the midst of our own more ponderous language, the expression meaus—so far as it means anything—humbug.

Because when au Englishman thinks over much of his own prospects, the rose-tint has been laid on by a cleverer and less scrupulous artist than himself.

"Couleur de Rose!"—there was a piece of tinted glass held up to Eve's eyes in Paradise, before the French language or the latest Parisian fashions were thought of, and we have been lookiug for a few thousand years since then in cool blood at the naked reality, the idealizatiou of which she thought so lovely.

"Ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil," said the serpent, throwing, we may be sure, an exquisite rose-tint over flower and shrub; and thus beguiled, our unfortunate mother ate, to discover that good and evil meant niuety-nine and three-quarters per cent. of evil, and one-quarter per ceut. of good.

In a minor degree, the cousequences arc much the same with us now. We first look through the glass and think everything lovely; then we see the other side, and think nothing comely, whereas were we to take "Couleur de Rose" for what it is worth, we should not feel disappointed when we behold reality face to face.

A blind faith is easier than scepticism, and wholesomer too some people say; but this proposition is open to qnestion, since there can be little doubt but that "Couleur de Rose," and its accompanying shams are fruitful sources of discontent, envy, jealousy, hatred, and all uncharitableness.

For people accept the false gloss, and knowiug how rough a surface life presents to them, each amongst the number cries:—

"Why is it that A, B, C, D, and so forth, meet with this good fortune, whilst I, alone of all the letters in the alphabet, have to earn my living in the sweat of my brow?"

Which is all very natural, only if he could see the circumstances of his fellows without the conversational glamour thrown over them, he would know life to be not so much sweeter to A than to Z, as A strives to make it appear.

* * * What does 'Couleur de Rose' mean in English if it be not a deliberate intention to deceive?

"For it is not the art of making the best things—it is not even a far-away cousin of that happy temperament which sets out the poor furniture of its life to the best advantage, chooses the sunniest casement of its dwelling from which to look over the plains of existence, goes smilingly afoot, and refrains from turning a sullen face on the whole world because the mud from the wheels of some rich man's carriage chances to splash its clothes.

"Much to be respected is the man capablo of doing this, who, having grievances, strives to lessen them—not by deceiving others, but by conquering himself—who can face his daily work, his actual position, without repining, and who presents his position to his fellows through no delusive rosy medium, but honestly and simply as it seems to his own happy, contented temper."

NEW THEORY OF THE GULF STREAM.

The article entitled "The Water-Link of Europe," propounded what its author claims to be an entirely new theory of the causes and nature of the gulf stream, namely, that it is a subterranean water, fed by the Mediterranean sea. Briefly stated, the idea is, that there is a secret outlet at the bottom of the Mediterranean, near the voxtex of Scylla and Charybdis, and that the great body of the waters of that sea that are not carried off by evaporation, enter the earth through the caverns at the bottom of the whirlpool and passing nnder the earth in the direction of the west, and finds a similar opening to the surface, off the coast of Yucatan. "The Mediterranean, it is well known," says the writer, "has recieved a constant flow from the South Atlantic Ocean ever since man has had a knowledge of its existeuce. A vessel left at the opening of the Straits of Gibraltar, leading into the Mediterranean, will steadily drift into that sea, though unguided by sails or any outward motive power. The current sweeps in at the rate of threo miles an hour, and none exists on the surface or beneath to counteract it. There is no other outlet to this sea but that at the Straits, while there are twelve rivers flowing into it in differeut directions, one of them the large river Nile. The practical question naturally arises, where does this large deposit of the waters of the Atlantic escape? It is proved that it does not flow out at the Straits, and it is impossible that it should pass off in exhalation. The inflow of its rivers and the descent of its rains are amply sufficient to re-supply all the water that escapes by exhalation; and if the process were to increase beyond this to a point necessary to account for the supply from the Atlantic, the bed of the Mediterrancan would long ere this have become a solid body of salt."

The writer's theory would seem plausible enough, could he explain how the flow of the subterranean stream is mantained. It would seem, upon natural principles, as though the water after once filling the caverunous passage, if such there be, would remain staguant. Mr. Denison refers to no known law that would account for such a circuit as his hypothesis supposes.

THE QUEEN'S SIN.

The fist volume of Queen Victoria's book, entitled "The Early Years of His Royal Highness, the Priuce Consort," has appropriately been spoken of as "A Royal Idyll." It is Arcadian in its freshness and simplicity, and in the romantic beauty, tinged with pure poetic sentiment of the story which it unfolds. The Priuce Albert presented to the reader of this exquisite idyll, is not the mature, the prudent, and the variously accomplished public man of the popular conception. He is an impulsive, ardent, and generous boy, full of high hopes and noble aspirations, yet by no means a "model young man," in the conventional seuse, nor free from the erratic impulses which manifest themselves in the mischievous escapades and sophomonic tricks of our college youth. We do not propose to dwell upon a volume, which is probably already in the hands of most of our readers, but shall content ourselves with a single extract, in which the royal author reproaches herself with a charming, but all unroyal frankness and simplicity for the obstacles which she long interposed to the marriage. She was, she tells us, disinclined to an early marriago, and for the delay upon which she insisted, she touchingly upbraids herself as for a sin against the dead. She says:

"Nor can the Queen think without indignation against herself of her wish to keep the Prince waiting for probably three or four years, at the risk of ruining all his prospects in life, until she might feel iuclined to marry! * * * * * * The only excuse the Queen can make for herself is in the fact that the sudden change from the secluded life at Kensingtou to the independence of her position as Queen regnant at the age of eighteen, put all idea of marriage out of her mind, which she now most bitterly regrets. A worse school for a young girl, or one more detrimental to all natural feelings and affections, cannot well be imagined than the position of a Queen at eighteen, without experience and without a husband to guide and support her. This the Queen can state from painful experience, and she thanks God that nouo of her dear daughters are exposed to such danger."

"Happy is the wife," exclaims one of tho reveiwers of tho book, "and happy the husband, who has no heavier sin to regret and repent! The manifestation of a spotless conscience in this touching self-apology is one of the most delicate suggestions in the book of a perfect union. How little there can have been in it to vex the tenderest scrupulousness when this girlish hesitation shows half like a crime! The position of "a queen at eighteen" thus modestly brought before us might well have excused a more serious fault."

Altogether, this first volume, devoted to tho "early years" of Prince Albert, and to the youthful loves of the royal pair, possesses a singular charm, and one that the subsequent volumes, devoted to graver matters, will, we suspect, scarcely rival.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE New York Evening Mail says: It's reported that strong representations have been made to George P. Putnam & Son, in favor of making their proposed magazine of the illustrated order. The plan is to embellish almost every page with appropraite engravings. This would undoubtedly take with the public; bnt it implies great difficnlties in regard to the artists. We have very good authority for saying that it is next to impossible to secure a corps of competent designers, upon whom any dependence can be placed for steady routino work. Probably this fact had weight in the ultimate abandonment of the idea.

THE Citizen indulges in this hit at Henry Ward Beecher's story: "An enterprising manager proposes to consolidate all the theatrical companies in the country into one troupe, and play Beecher's 'Norwood.' He expects even then that some of the performers would have to sustain double parts."

THE New York Evening Mail says: "Mr. E. H. House's health is said to be very poor since he went to London. Mr. House is one of the last that survive of a brilliant coterie of young men who have died in the hayday of yonth within the past two or three years—among them George Arnold, 'Artomus Ward,' etc."

JOHN PAUL in the New York Citizen has the following: "Society, however,—I am sorry to say it—abounds with animate gimlets—creatures that pride themselves npon their penetration, and are forever essaying their powers. They bore you, and that is all."

SUCCESSFUL MEN.—The successful man is not necessarily to bo envied—not always the happiest man. Human nature cannot have its own will long, without becoming deteriorated by it. We are appointed to struggle, and in our struggling, our highest life is developed. The time will come when the laws of our present condition will cease, and when we shall bo able to bask in tho sunshine of success without virility, or encrvation of our virtues. Till then, it is our wisdom to accept our lot and make tho best of it, to seek for our enjoyment in our work, rather than what the work produces—to till the soil, and dismiss all needless anxiety about tho harvest—to be more concerned that we should sncceed; in a word, to bear ourselves like well-disciplined soldiors, with whom strict obedience is the most sacred obligations, and are thereby absolved from responsibility as to its results. Then, so far as success is vouchsafed to us, it will be grateful; so far as it is denied, it will not disconcert us. Thus living, our life wi'l be its own success.

A GOOD paper is a true leveler, it gives to all who will faithfully use it, tho society, the spiritual presenco of the best and greatest of our race.

CRITICS are sentinels in the grand army of letters, stationed at the corners of newspapers and reviews to challenge evry new comer.

PEOPLE often spend half their lives in contracting maladies, and the other half in trying to get rid of them.

PACIFIC ASPHALTUM COMPANY.—This company is at present engaged in laying down one of their celebrated asphaltum pavements in front of the Lick House, in place of the brick one which was laid some four years ago, and was thought by pedestrians to be a fine, firm pavement, but in this short period, the bricks have been worn down to two thirds of their original thickness. The asphaltum used and for sale by this company is the purest to be found in the market, being free from rock, clay or other impurities. It is the cheapest and most durable pavement, and is fast taking the place of the plank and brick pavement everywhere. The office of the Pacific Asphaltum Co. is at No. 533 Kearny street, corner of Sacramento. Nenval & Co. proprietors.

OYSTERS AND CLAMS.—Wm. Roalfe, Nos. 40, 41, and 42, California Market, entrance on California street, keeps on hand, from 6 A.M. until 5 P. M., and Saturday nights until 10 P. M., oysters and clams. Families supplied at the shortest notice with fresh oysters and clams. The deviled-crabs are to be had here and nowhere else. And for business men, on California street, there is no place where a better lunch can be served. Mr. Roalfe is well known to the community as a first class caterer. Call and leave your orders, wholesale or retail.

FEED STORE.—George Morrow,—wholesale and retail dealears in Hay, Grain, and feed of all kinds, offer the greatest inducement to those who wish to furnish their stock with fresh and healthy feed. This firm has been in the business for many years and parties can rely on the purchases made at this establishment, No. 21 Clay and 28 Commercial streets, between Drum and East.

A TALE OF SAVAGE LIFE.

BY JOHN QUILL.

THIS is a thrilling narrative of a noble North American Indian.

It is also the simple story of a woman's love.

And it is a touching illustration of the power of paternal affection.

As well as a tale of bitter and terrible revenge.

It is also first-class in every respect, and warranted to keep one year in any climate, and it is a number of other things, which I won't mention, because I don't want to tell the anecdote before I get to it. For I once knew a man who undertook to write a preface to his book, and when he got through he couldn't tell whether to make a book of the preface, or a preface of the book, and he lost his reason, and became a straw-haired lunatic trying to decide.

Out in the prairie dwelt an Indian chief named Fiery Nose, and Fiery Nose had a daughter, over whose head sixteen Indian summers might have passed.

Now it will be necessary, you perceive, that this copper complected young maiden should have a lover, in order to give this story a proper degree of interest. So she had one, and his name was Buffalo Bull, and he was an aged brave, some years her senior, and he wore knock knees and goggles, and was related to a red haired tribe of Indians who ate the bread of idleness, excepting when they were compelled to work for a living. Buffalo Bull was a fine old brave, and he always hit directly from the shoulder, and considered it no disgrace to drink nine fingers of fire water at one time, and wear crape on his hat when his first wife died.

He also had a cow-lick in his hair.

"The old aborigine Fiery Nose, hadn't the slightest idea in the world that such a venerable old savage as B. B., sprung in the knees as he was, ever thought to marry his daughter. But, strange to say, that was the very identical thing upon which Buffalo had set his heart.

So he called one evening at the family mansion of Fiery Nose, with the intention of murdering him in a peaceable and friendly manner, and then eloping with his daughter, the fair Prairie Flower.

On that very night Fiery Nose sat in his library with his war paint on, trying to balance his scalp account, which was one scalp short, and the Prairie Flower also wore paint, and sat reading Tupper's inspiring poems under the chandelier in the front parlor.

When Buffalo Bull came in, he went back into the library, and entered into conversation with the old man, for he had rare conversational powers, and spoke his native tongue with a facility that was at once admirable and remarkable.

"Will you take a pipe?" asked the hospitable Fiery Nose; "do take one," handing him a coil of gas pipe. "I have some tobacco that has a stamp on it, and it consequently must be good. It was grown in Paducha."

"Why don't you use the 'Mud Turtle' brand?" observed Buffalo Bull. "Every paper you buy has a million dollar bill in it, and you can get it for five cents. It is an excellent investment for your surplus earnings. Let me advise you to get some."

"Ah, I will," said Fiery Nose. "Prayhaire," said he to his child, "go around and buy me two papers of Mud Turtle tobacco. "You'd better ride. Get a quarter's worth of tickets, and you may buy 'yellow jack' with the change."

The fair Prairie Flower kissed her aged parent until his colors began to run, and then she went out on her errand with a small hat over her eyes.

"Nice girl, ain't she?" said Fiery Nose; "I've had a great deal of trouble bringing her up, but I am amply repaid, and I attribute all to the fact that I raised her with yeast powders. I got the best, and they did the business."

"She is a fine girl, and no mistake, and she seems good, too. By the way, how are you getting along over at your Sunday School?"

"Tolerably, thank you," said Fiery Nose; "tolerably. I make them an address, and play a few tunes on the melodeon every Sabbath afternoon; but I can't attend to it properly, you know."

"No? Why not?"

"Well, you see, I am constantly interrupted. Here last Sunday, while I was right in the midst of a touching hymn, a pale face came down the road, and I was obliged to go out and murder him. He ran, but I told him that he'd got to die, and if he didn't want to go out on the fly, he'd better succumb at once."

"Did he?"

"Yes, he came up and apologized for running on the ground that he wanted to see a man. But I was mad, for you know I am lymphatic, with a tendency to apoplexy, and I don't like to run."

"Right enough, too."

"So I gripped onto this fellow like a double-headed terrier, and then I scalped him, and let him go. He asked me what I thought he ought to do, and I told him I would advise him as a friend to use hair restorative warranted not to dye, and to shake the bottle, and to rub it well in."

"By the way, old boy," ejaculated Buffalo Bull, "speaking of your daughter, she's a regular straight-out, gamboge-skinned, aboriginal angel, with no discount on her. She's a nobody bit of calico; and, while I think of it, I understand your Grizzly Bear, the festive brave of the Algonquins, has viewed her with a critic's eye and passed her imperfections by, and concluded to go for her. How sayest thou?"

"He has, has he? Well, permit me to remark that he has probably shinned up the incorrect tree. Him? why, I'd just as leave marry her to some wooden-headed cigar store Indian, I would, upon my sacred word of honor as a gentleman."

"She's too good for him, peradventure," observed Buffalo Bull sententiously.

"Venture your whole pile on that, me boy. She wears low-down bonnets, and has her linen embroidered, she does; besides she chews gum, and has a four-ounce ring through her nose. No girl like that's a going to fling herself away, is she? Well, I should think not. Not while her pa can dabble his hands in gore, at any rate, I reckon."

"But, my friend," observed Bull with a trembling voice, "how much these ebullitions remind me of my childhood's days. Look at me while I weep; listen to these bona fide tears as they patter in the spittoon. O where, where are the friends of me youth. O where are the loved ones gone?"

"I give it up," said Fiery Nose, after a few moments calm and patient thought.

"Don't you recollect how we used to go out on the trail and capture little children and gouge their eyes out, and chop 'em into bits, and then come home and learn our catechisms, and knife our next-door neighbor, and then pray to the Great Manitou before we went to bed. Ah, those were happy, happy days, and we were hilarious little Injuns, weren't we. But now all these things are mingled with the irrevocable past, you can just bet they are."

"Why, you're drunk, ain't you?" asked Fiery Nose, "you're talking first-class drivel. Where do you get your fire-water. I'll have to get Senator Yates to come and lecture you on temperance."

To this Buffalo Bill deigned no reply, but pretending to see something on the top knot of Fiery Nose, he asked him to stoop down a minute while he picked it off. He then clandestinely jerked out his scalping-knife and lifted his hair, after which he jabbed his knife into him, and let him die.

Just then Prairie Flower returned with the tobacco, and perceiving at a glance the condition of her parent, she observed to Buffalo Bill that it seemed to be pretty well up with the old man.

"Hm-m, yes," said he, "but a thought strikes me—will you be mine?"

"Well, I don't know; let me see, what was your income tax last year?"

"I paid tax on two horse blankets, a Barlow knife, and thirty-seven scalps. Besides I love you to distraction. Come to this loving heart; rest on my bosom, rest. Say will you?"

"I am ever thine own," said Prairie Flower, as she nestled closely against his hunting shirt."

And on her lover's arm she leant,
And round her waist she felt it fold;
He said, "I do not care a cent,"
She said, "I'll bet he finds he's sold."

Thus were these two aboriginal savages made happy in the fullness of each other's love. She grew old and ugly in time, and he, in the depth of his unspeakable affection, used to sit day after day smoking on the front doorsteps, while she hoed corn and wheeled home potatoes in a push-cart. Until at last she was called home to the happy hunting ground, and he immediately put fresh crape on his Sunday hat, and began browsing around for another girl.

But does not this teach us all a lesson, that—that—teach us, I say, a lesson that we—that we—that we, I say, may—Let that pass, however, doubtless it does teach a lesson, but it's of no consequence.—Philadelphia Sunday Transcript.

THE REV C. W. VINING, who has safely returned from a journey in the East, thoughtfully brings us, among other curiosities, some of the newspapers published in Egypt and Turkey. They are in four languages, French, Turkish, Armenian, and Greek. We cannot read them, but he can, and through his patience we have been gratified to learn their contents, and the materials of which newspapers are made up in the land of the Osmanlis. Our American enterprise is well represented: stoves, wooden and tinware, ploughs, axes and tools are advertised from this country. In each of the four languages are heralded the virtues of the remedies made by our celebrated countrymen, Dr. J. C. Ayer & Co., of Lowell. They seem not to depend on their home reputation for confidence abroad, but publish the certificates of the Musselmen rulers themselves, to the cures which those medicines have made in their midst. The Rev. gentleman informs us that the whole of the remedial aid employed in those countries, comes from Europe or America, as they possess no medical colleges or schools in which they have any confidence themselves. There arose the religious ideas which pervade the human family, but almost all that is usefull in art or invention must be carried back to these, the earlier settlements of mankind.—Lynn News.

SICK people have guaranteed cures in almost all cases for a reasonable stipulated fee, if so agreed, because no medicines are used, nor bleeding, blistering, nor plastering, by Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

A PUBLIC BENEFACTOR.

"Some men are born great; some achieve greatness; and some have greatness thrust upon them."

History is full of the names of men who by sheer force of indomitable will have surmounted every obstacle, and reached the foremost nich in the temple of fame. To such, each new impediment thrown in their way acts as a new incentive to energy: they may halt for a moment, but it is only to recover strength to surmount the new obstruction, not to retreat from the field. Men of this character are to be found in nearly every walk of life—the senate, the camp, the bar, the commercial and the social circles. They feel that it is in them to conquer, set their minds to the task, and conquer they do. And the poor man who, by the exercise of his own unaided energies, raises to the first rank in commercial pursuits, and uses the wealth at his command for the promotion of the happiness of his fellows, is entitled to proportionately as much praise as the general who wins battles by the wisdom of his combinations and the celerity of his movements.

The United States is par excellence the land of self-made men. Here no legal barriers interpose to cramp the intellect or check the ambition in its upward flight; here no line of demarkation intervenes to discourage, or false pride of birth to chill aspiring genius. The mechanic of to-day may be administering the affairs of the nation a few years hence, and the pauper of this hour may be a millionaire the next. Mind and will alone are necessary. But in no part of America are there so many evidences of what mind and will may accomplish as California affords. And one of the most remarkable instances is to be found in the person of Mr. Thomas Mooney, President of the California Building and Loan Society and Builders' Insurance Company. Some seven years since Mr. Mooney landed on our shores, poor and almost friendless. His literary productions had made his name familar, but a long course of adversity had made men regard him more in the light of visionary (to use no harsher term) than a man of profound thought. It is needless to refer to his early undertakings among us; they are sufficiently familiar. In the year eighteen hundred and sixty-one, however, in the face of innumerable difficulties (the least of which was not the silent but expressive shrug, and open opposition of the would-be wiseacres who rule on 'Change,) without any capital worthy of mention, and only the names of a few of our responsible citizens to give "tone" to the thing—he organized the California Building and Loan Society. The gradual growth and present wealth of this institution are now too familiar to our readers to need special mention here. About a year ago his shrewd mind comprehended the importance of attaching to the bank a fire insurance company; and the matter laid before the stockholders, it was forthwith agreed to. This too was cried down as visionary, and tabooed by "respectable" institutions of a like character. He, however, persevered; and by dint of good management, the "Builders Insurance" has now attained the position in the confidence of the community unsurpassed by any of its more pretentious rivals. And this result is mainly attributed to the liberal policy pursued by its President. Every public charity was generously assisted; every appeal made to him by struggling societies was promptly responded to, and the deserving poor knocked not at his door in vain. He has extensively aided home manufactures, by advancing funds for their construction when more careful, but less far-seeing, institutions had refused them aid. And now he has on foot the grandest scheme of all—an Immigration Aid Society, to induce the denizens of the overcrowded, overworked and ill-paid European and Atlantic cities to settle in the fertile valleys of the Pacific coast—a scheme which, if successful, will add, in a few years, millions to the wealth of our young State. And that it will be a success we have no doubt, provided the people encourage the enterprise, and thus show themselves capable of comprehending the greatness of the undertaking; for its success or failure will materially affect all who design making California their home.—Monitor.

PHILADELPHIA BREWERY.—This old established and favorite Brewery on Second street, between Folsom and Howard, is now under the sole management of Mr. John Wieland, he having purchased the interest of his former partner, will continue to serve their old customers as formally. Mr. Wieland is also a part proprietor, and sole agent for the Pacific Coast, of the celebrated "Golden Sand" Bourbon Whisky, a superior article, which he will dispose of to the trade at wholesale. Those in the trade who wish to procure a genuine article of Bourbon Whisky, direct from the distillery at Louisville, Kentucky, Scmithiss and Wieland, proprietors, can do so by leaving their orders at the Philadelphia Brewery as above.

DRY GOODS AT POPULAR PRICES.—Meagher, Taaffe & Co., No. 9 Montgomery street, advertise in to-day's CALIFORNIAN to the "Popular Trade in Dry Goods," and announce a great reduction in prices in many lines of goods, such as cloaks, silks, lace curtains and family dry goods. It is there popular prices that make the popular trade for which this house is noted. People will go where they can buy the cheapest.

CURING the sick on true principles of science, and guaranteeing cures in almost all cases, is the daily routine of Dr. Bourne's practice, for stipulated reasonable fees, and on quick time, because he uses no medicines and is in earnest in what he undertakes. No. 10 Masonic Temple. *

FOR the miserable feelings inflicted upon many persons by cold and stormy days, there is no antidote like Dr. Bourne's baths—price one dollar—and worth from twenty times that amount to them. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

WAITING FOR THE HARVEST.

When will the harvest come?
Not long to wait, upon the upland glowing,
Not long in valley rich with waving grain,
Not long to wait for the profit of the sowing,
For crowned sheaves of corn and heaped up wain,
The fields have ripened in the sun of Summer,
The sweet winds woo and kiss the leaden ears,
Which bend a moment to the fragrant comer
And then again flash out as golden spears.
Soon will the harvest come!

When will the harvest come!
Of toilsome action and of weary thought,
Long waiting is the shadow of great sorrow,
Heart lessons oftentimes most dearly bought,
Then anxious looking for a better morrow?
When will the harvest come of all our sowing?
When will the love be garnered into store
Which in old time seemed wasted in bestowing—
Will it return, increasing more and more?
When will the harvest come?

When will the harvest come?
The full fruition of the words once spoken,
The hopes we cherished and the prayers we sped?
It may be when the chords of life are broken,
When we who spoke and hoped and prayed are dead.
The song we sang in triumph may be ringing
In ages yet to come when we are cold;
The future to our children may be bringing
The bread we cast upon the waves of old—
Then may the harvest come.

GUZLA.

A LEGEND OF BEYROUT.

GUZLA was the daughter of an old man who lived at Beyrout, in Syria, in circumstances of ease. No one knew to what race the old man belonged, and few could tell precisely at what period he had begun to inhabit that city. Some said that his face had been known in the market-place for more than half a century; others that he had settled there but recently. The truth seemed to be that he had at various times been a citizen of Beyrout; that he had often been absent for long periods; but that he had at length set up his tent there for good. They called him Effendi Ibrahim, a name not commonly adopted by Christains in the East; yet Guzla was known to frequent the Church of the Maronites with her mother; a grave woman, whose face was always veiled, even when persons of her own sex only were present.

Effendi Ibrahim was always magnificently dressed, and never appeared in public but with a certain state. He was proud of a fine white beard that flowed down over the breast of his caftan; and ostentatiously exhibited the jewels on his fingers. Many merchants therefore, were willing to believe in his respectability—despite some ugly rumors that spoke of piracy and unlawful connexions—and more than one made overtures for the hand of Guzla, on behalf of son or self. That she would have a splendid dowry no one could doubt; so there was no danger that the world would laugh at the connexion.

The female gossips of the city, moreover, spread abroad the report that Guzla was marvelously beautiful. But, as her beauty was of a peculiar kind, they found it difficult to convey a notion of it by comparisons. Her cheeks were not round and plump and rosy, nor were her eyes full of fire and merriment; her lips did not pout; and her figure by no means admitted of that luxury of description to which oriental match-makers are fond of indulging. She was rather serious than gay, and had something firm and masterly about her appearance. Was she sickly, or boyish, or awkward? The suggestion roused the anger of the good ladies; who declared that they had never seen anything so delicate and maidenly, except, (and they hinted this with some reserve and compunction,) a certain portrait, before which the faithful signed themselves as they entered the church. This was a bold comparison; but the truth was that they meant that Guzla had the bearing of a saint and not of a sultana.

Most of those who had previously aspired to bring her home, dropped away when they understood what was meant; for they wanted something very different from a saint. One or two, however, more practical, felt that a good dowry should make them put up with many disagreeable things. They persevered so far as to lay their suit before the father; who received them with a sort of ferocious jocularity, endeavored to represent himself as a very dangerous person to deal with, and finally declined their offers. He was persuaded, he said, that Guzla would not make a good wife for any such persons, and that if she were not happy, he should be obliged to kill his son in-law.

As for Guzla she heard little or nothing of these discussions—spending all her time with her mother in the inner rooms of her father's great house, which stood alone near the land-gate of the city. Her life was in great part one of meditation and prayer. Her mother watched over the development of her mind and character with a nervous anxiety, and the girl more than once suspected that she was often purposely kept from her father's sight. It was certain that the old man loved her in his own way. All her wishes he was ready to satisfy, the instant they were expressed; but he had a strange, wild, lawless style of talk, in which he would sometimes indulge, as if it gave him a fierce delight in saying things that stupified poor Guzla, and made her look upon him for a moment as though he were not her father, but another being who had taken his shape. Then mother, as soon as they were left alone would endeavor to direct her attention from what had taken place, and lead her mind to the contemplation of religious subjects; or to speak to her of some neighboring misfortune which it was in their power to alleviate. These arts were generally successful; but sometimes poor Guzla could not be deprived of her troublesome thoughts, and she would seek an opportunity to be alone, and remain musing in some dim recess, until she felt her mind grow giddy. She then knew where to fly for succor; and her mother's breast was the altar upon which she prayed.

There was evidently a secret in this household—a secret that hung over it like a cloud; now dark and heavy, now bright and almost transparent, but never entirely dispersed. The legend does not think it necessary to seek the truth with much anxiety; for, as usual, it dislikes retrospection, and prefers to take us by the hand and lead us on towards the future. It seems to be implied that the scandal-mongers of Beyrout were well informed, and that this Christain Ibrahim—Christain or Pagan, there was no certainty which—had formerly been a self-elected king of the seas; and that all the wealth he had amassed was stained with blood. Where he had first known the mother of Guzla was the most profound part of the secret. She never spoke of her early time but with horror and trembling; and was sometimes seen to smile in a strange manner, as if she were debating some great cause within herself, in which love and hatred pleaded on different sides. The former passion gained the day no doubt; for, she continued to love on calmly, and never gave outward sign of being disturbed in mind, stronger than she would, without seeming cause, seize Guzla in her arms and overpower her with caresses, in the midst of which, some tears were scattered upon the maiden's hands and garments, like pearls accidentally unstrung.

Thus they lived on until the time came when Guzla was nearing the limits of womanhood. Then the Effendi, carelessly, as he was smoking his pipe, upon which Guzla had just placed a live coal, patted the girl on the head, and mentioned that in a day or two her future husband would present himself. Guzla, perhaps for the first time in her life, raised her eyes with an arch expression to her father's countenance, and was about to make some playful objection, when her mother, in a sad solemn voice, that sounded like the first note of a warning peal, said, "And whence, Ibrahim, does this sudden husband come?"

A long glance was exchanged between the two parents—kindled perhaps by terrible memories. The mother of Guzla sank back almost helpless on her couch; and the father rose and slowly moved away from the room. He returned presently, as if he had required a moment's solitude to find all his resolution; and said in a loud and firm voice:

"The husband whom I have chosen for my daughter is named Lanfranc."

"All is lost!" murmured the mother of Guzla when they were left alone: and then they embraced, a long while, in silence.

"Thou must go and cast thyself on thy knees before thy father," at length said the mother; "and not stir until thou hast obtained the promise of another husband. This one is a man of terror and guilt. He will put thy soul in danger."

"Is he young?" inquired Guzla, in a vague, uncertain voice; and her eyes, filled with unwonted light, seemed to be gazing towards the future. Her mother took her in her arms and dragged her almost roughly upon her knees, where she held her in a tight embrace.

"Daughter," she said at last, "it is not meet that thou shouldst know all the mysteries of the past. This Lanfranc is a child of blood! and will make both thee and me miserable."

Guzla remained silent for some time, but clasped her mother closer and closer; and it was not necessary for her to say at length, that if, by any means, the marriage could be averted, she would obey the warning.

Two or three days afterwards, a man in the prime of life, with bold, handsome features, and manners that were rather boisterous than cheerful, presented himself at the house of Ibrahim. He came without attendants or baggage; and there was nothing to tell whether he had arrived by sea or by land. When Guzla heard that this was Lanfranc and saw that he never entered a room without first cautiously glancing towards every corner; that his conversation with her father was in whispers; that he saluted her mother with almost contemptuous familiarity, and gazed on her own features—when in obedience to severe orders unveiled—with intent admiration, the sentiment that began to take shape in her mind was not one of love. She spoke freely to her father; but he, whose manner was kind, usually, though rough, became furious like a wild beast. He raised his hand to strike her, and swore, by powers, of which she knew nothing, that within twenty-four hours she must be betrothed to Lanfranc.

"He has no time to lose in trifling. You must consent and go with him at once."

This interview decided Guzla to act, and made her dissimulate in her own defence.

"Bless me, father," said she seizing his hand, "that I may become strong and valiant."

Misunderstanding her meaning he blessed her, and even imprinted a kiss upon her forehead. Then she went, strong, to her mother and announced her intention of flying from the house that night, and taking refuge on the mountains of Lebanon; where there were convents of holy women who would receive her.

"Wilt thou come with me?" she said.

The mother answered that to fly, it was necessary to be young and light of foot. "We live almost wealth," she said, "and yet have no money. I will remain, but thou must go. Take some jewels, but clothe thyself in mean garments, those of the slave Zara."

The two women, mother and daughter, waited till the sun had gone down; then Guzla was clothed in the borrowed garments; and after many embraces and tears, climbed over the garden wall and proceeded towards the gates of the city.

The mother knew how terrible would be the anger of Ibrahim when he discovered what had taken place; but she had persuaded Guzla that when once convinced how repugnant this marriage was to her, he would relent. Moreover she had determined to sacrifice herself to insure the safety of her daughter. The absence of both would have been at once perceived. But at supper time it was easy to persuade the father and Lanfranc that Guzla had preferred remaining in her room, from modesty, or some other similar reason. Afterwards the poor mother had a terrible fright. Zara came to her and whispered: "Why have you taken my garments and put them upon Guzla, and helped her to get over the garden wall?"

The only answer was an imploring glance.

"It is not good," said the slave-girl, "that Guzla should go to the mountains alone. I will follow her, and before morning we shall be together." So, Zara departed, and was soon running lightly along the path leading towards the wildest parts of Lebanon, whither she knew her young mistress desired to repair.

Next morning the truth became known; and Ibrahim drew his sword to slay the mother of Guzla; but something in her glance checked him. He was content to lock her in her room, and bid Lanfranc seek out traces of the fugitives, and follow and bring them back.

Meanwhile, Guzla, with leaping heart and uncertain steps, had passed through the city-gates and hastened towards the East, trusting to Providence to be her guide. She paused at a little ruined chapel in the fields, and prayed for protection. Then her imagination began to warm, and her courage to increase. She even beheld, says the legend, a bright star moving low along the earth before her; and, giving herself up to faith, followed it until she came to the foot of the mountains. Then it disappeared. She took this to be a warning that she must pause and rest; and, turning aside, went and sat under a tree. Scarcely had she quitted the path when a party of men speaking loud and boisteronsly, came along it. If she had continued her journey she must have met them, and there might have been danger. Presently afterwards the star shone again; and, getting up, she proceeded, ascending the steep slope, until again she was warned to halt. This time she took refuge in a Mohammedan tomb, where she fell asleep, and dreamed that her mother was fanning her as she lay, or stooping over her, and kissing her between the eyes. When she woke, the sun was shining over the far up summits of the mountains, down along its woody slopes where mist and light clouds here and there linger, illuminating the fertile plain, and sparkling in the indigo-colored sea, which advanced in innumerable curves and creeks far into the land. The city of Beyrout was distinctly visible at her feet; and she thought even, that she could hear the hum of the awakening population, in the midst of which—sharp and clearly defined as the lark's song in the sky above—she could hear the notes of a mother's voice praying for her absent child.

She stood out before the tomb a moment to measure with a glace the space she had traversed during the night. Her name was pronouced by a voice among the bushes below. Looking down in affright she beheld Zara, who had lost her way in the darkness, climbing up out of breath.

"Art thou come to help those who wish to take me?" said Guzla. "Know that I have a sharp knife in one sleeve and a string of pearls in the other. Which wilt thou have?"

"I have come to be the companion of thy steps," was the reply.

Then the slave girl related how she had become possessed of her secret; and they agreed to go on together in search of a place of refuge.

They climbed still higher—sometimes entering woody gorges—sometimes coming out again into view of the vast country below. Suddenly, Guzla said to Zara:

"I see a group of horsemen galloping. Look whether they do not seem to be our pursuers."

"They may be," replied Zara; "but they are far distant; the road for horses winds and winds, and they cannot reach this place for hours. Let us leave the road track and go towards the cedars."

They accordingly struck in amidst the trees, and proceeded until nightfall: sometime resting, or staying to seek for roots in the earth. For, they had made no provision, and hunger began to make itself felt. Zara, who had lived as a child in the wild center of Africa, ran to and fro, and saved her mistress the greater part of the trouble. They ate together; and talked of the anxious mother who was still praying for their safety.

That night they slept under of cover a brown cedar tree, with branches sweeping down to the very earth. At an early hour they were awakened by the trampling of horses' feet, and the sound of human voices.

"We cannot look inside every tree," said some one, and they at once recognized that voice; "but the fugitives must be in this forest. The wood-cutter saw them. We shall find them when the day comes. Let us go on."

They rode away; leaving Guzla and her companion overwhelmed with fear. Neither of them dared move from beneath their shelter, even when daylight came, and remained long, trembling and praying. It was near noon when Zara, peeping between the branches, beheld a human figure approaching slowly, and looking anxiously to the right and to the left.

"We are discovered," murmured Guzla, coming to gaze over the shoulder of the slave. "They have dispersed, and one man will be sufficient to make us both prisoners."

They soon saw that the form they feared, was a youth of grave and sober aspect, who advanced in a line that would have led him past the tree, but stopped every now and then, and said in a loud voice:

"This is a warning. If any be concealed who fear capture, let them come forth at once, and accept my guidance. I only, can lead them to a place of safety."

"A cunning artifice, truly," quoth Zara. "We must not stir."

To her surprise, Guzla pushed aside the branches of the tree that concealed her, and stood out in the sunlight, with folded arms, before the young stranger.

"There is truth and virtue in thy aspect," said she. "Be then our guide."

The youth gazed at her for a moment in admiration; and then, without saying a word led the way beneath the cedars that stretched towards the South. They had scarcely entered a narrow gorge in that direction, before the wood behind them was filled with the voices of men shouting to one another. Guzla started in dismay, and clung to the stranger's arm.

"There is no fear," said he, smiling gravely. "We shall soon be in a far country." They came to a narrow passage in the rock, like a doorway. As the young man passed through, he waved his hand in a peculiar manner. Guzla and Zara followed; and both for an instant felt drowsy and bewildered. The whole world seemed to shrink suddenly from them, and then to come back as suddenly. They stepped once, as it were, upon yielding vapor, and thought that they floated like spirits; but then, they firmly pressed a lovely slope of green grass and flowers, shaded here and there by feathery trees, and leading down to a series of lakelets, communicating one with the other by sprinkling cascades; until, far down, the whole ended in a vast river, which wound over a plain, until it was lost in an horizon of mist and gold. Guzla turned round to look at the passage by which she had come; but saw no traces thereof. She wished to question the stranger; but, when she moved her lips, there was no sound. Then first she noticed the universal silence that pervaded this beautiful land. The breezes did not murmur, nor did the grasses rustle. The waters moved without noise; and, wherever she turned, her steps fell like feathers upon oil. Yet, it was evident that in that mysterious region, there were means by which its inhabitants could communicate their thoughts without the deceitful sound of words. The young man looked at her, and thus told her from his heart, that this was the refuge of the unfortunate who wished to shun the cares, the dangers, and the responsibilities of the human world. Whoever chose to abide there, might live forever in undisturbed happiness, on one sole condition—not to regret nor care for the mortals, however near and dear, whom they had left behind them. There was no decay to be feared, but no progress. No new ties could be formed, and the pangs of separation could not be felt. That was, in fact, the land of Selfish Content.

Guzla wandered on with Zara by her side, feeling an ineffable sense of physical well-being; but in her heart, there soon began to stir certain regrets, which even the presence of that young man, who had saved her from danger, and who looked so good and beautiful, could not allay. She thought of her mother, to whom she could send no news of her safety, and who would probably die of grief, if not of ill-treatment. She thought also of Beyrout, and the green country on one side, and the blue sea on the other; of the dark little Maronite church; of the poor whose sufferings she used to relieve; and of the stern tenderness of her father. Would it not be better to have remained in that world, even in the midst of danger, to have come to this, where there could be no duty, because there could be no suffering? The silence around her began to seem horrible. She tried to raise her voice in lamentation, but in vain.

Zara was quite happy. She roved to and fro, and rolled among the flowers; and, when they came to the banks of the lake, plunged into the shallow, transparent waters, that rippled without sound, and spreading forth her ebony arms, swam to and fro, laughing in the sunlight. Many forms of men and women, with tranquil faces, and quiet demeanor, appeared coming from beneath the trees; and Guzla noticed that none walked hand in hand, but all kept decently apart, as if the slightest contact would have dissolved their dream of happiness. She looked at her guide and told her thoughts. He gave her a fearful glance, that intimated she was endangering his existence, or his content. He made as if he would go away; but he could not take his eyes off those of Guzla. A transformation came over his countenance. Its tranquility disappeared. Joy and anguish struggled for the mastery. The young people advanced one towards the other: their hands touched. Then the whole scene around wavered and dimmed, and darker and more real forms rose on every side: that brilliant land was visible for a moment in fragments like mirage on distant valleys. It was not too late to return to it; but they pressed closer together. All vanished, and they found themselves sitting hand in hand in the midst of a wild and desolate country, over which the sun was just about to set. Zara came from beneath the trees; for, without her mistress, there would be no content for her.

The young man, whose name was Basil, had fled from oppression, and had lived some time in the unreal land. They agreed to put on disguises, and return, in spite of all dangers, to Beyrout. But they soon found that it was far, far distant. Some peasants whom they met, had, indeed, never heard of that city. They came to the habitations of men, and clothed themselves as pilgrims. Guzla sold her pearls, and thus they had sufficient to defray the expenses of their journey. They proceeded, mostly by night; and, whenever they were at a loss for their path, the star which had guided Guzla at first, appeared and directed their footsteps. Yet it was not before many months had passed, that they stood near the gate of the city of Beyrout.

"I am afraid to learn the news," said Guzla. "Go thou, Basil, and I will remain in this chapel with Zara until you come and tell me whether my mother be alive or dead, whether Lanfranc hath departed, and what hath happened to my father."

Basil shuddered as if they were about to be separated forever. During a single instant he regretted the bright tranquil land he had quitted for her sake. He begged to be allowed to kiss her on the brow before he went. He did so, and departed. Guzla saw him disappear amidst the crowd that poured in and out of the great gate of the city, and waited for his return, weeping bitterly. He never came, however; for the oppressor from whom he had fled, met him, and seized him, and caused him to be thrown into prison.

Towards evening Zara volunteered to go and endeavor to learn some news of what had taken place. But no sooner did she reach the neighborhood of Ibrahim's house, than an old fellow-slave recognised and betrayed her. She was seized by Lanfranc, and beaten until she expired, refusing to the last to betray her young mistress. In this way Guzla was left to pass the night alone in despair. But as soon as the gates were opened, she went in, drawing her hood over her face. There was a great crowd before her house, so that she could not approach it with ease. Alarm darkened her soul, and she eagerly inquired what was the matter. They told her that the wife of a wealthy man was about to be buried. This was enough. She pressed eagerly through the crowd; her hood falling back in her efforts, and arrived just in time to see the bier brought out on which lay her mother. She threw herself upon the body with a loud cry. It is said that a smile of love passed over the face of the corpse. Assuredly, all present felt that strong love had united those two persons, and that strong necessity alone had seperated them. When Lanfranc came forward to seize poor Guzla, they fell upoon him; and, in the midst of great clamor, attacked him and his friends, so that they were glad to escape from the city with their lives. An old man, with a long white beard, now appeared on the threshold of the house; and asked fervently what was the matter. This was Ibrahim, who, since Lanfranc's arrival, had ceased to be master in his own house, had been rarely abroad. A rough-looking man in the crowd laid his hand upon Guzla's shoulder. "Effendi," said he, "this bier is wide enough for two. Thy daughter is dead likewise." Without waiting for his answer, the bier-bearers resumed their burden, and the priests, though they murmured that all this was irregular, obeying the irresistible impulse of the popular voice, began their chanting. All Beyrout was soon astir and even the Mohammedans followed the procession at a distance.

Guzla's reputation became that of a saint. She was buried in the same grave with her mother; and soon afterwards, in the course of a single night, a magnificent monument was built over it by the order of Ibrahim, who devoted all his wealth to the erection of churches and rests for travelers, and retired to spend the remainder of his days in a cell dug out of the earth, in the wildest part of the mountains.

There is evidently a mystical intention in this narrative in which the idea of duty which tells us to meet the worst ills of this life with courage and constancy, whatever may befall, predominates, and serves to harmonise and render acceptible a number of incidents, some of which are strange and even extravagant. Is it not indeed better to return boldly with Zara, and Basil, and Guzla, and put our neck under the yoke of suffering—even to taste of the bitter waters of death—than to remain in the silent land of Selfish-content, where there is no communion because there are no desires, no pain because there is no joy, no hate because there is no love, and where isolated beings live in eternal satisfaction, not daring, not wishing, to exchange one clasp of the hands! Surely our troublsome earth is better than such a paradise.

Poetry of Indian Love.—We may shock the sensibilities of romance-loving boys and girls, by relating the manner in which the dark-eyed aboriginal damsel is espoused. There have been poems sung on the heavenly beauties of Pocahontas and Hiawatha, but we have not seen an Indian girl yet that we could compose an ode upon. The voluptuous form, olive features, ripe, red lips, delicate feet, well-formed ankles, lustrous, humid eyes, wavy masses of raven hair, a queenly head and a swan like throat, we have not seen. But we have seen a matter-of-fact, practical, and a most unpoetical Indian girl, handling most dexterously the axe, with coarse black eyes, nose inclined to be flat, her face of a dirty, greasy color, a large mouth, monstrous and flat feet, dwarfish legs, and not over-modestly dressed, and sometimes carrying a staring, round-eyed and grinning papoose, on whom she seemed to scorn to lavish those little, foolish maternal endearments, so natural and spontaneous to a mother's heart. When an Indian wishes a squaw to attend his lodge, cook his meals, and wait upon him, he does not launch into lyrical enthusiasm or fervid expressions of love; nor does he remember in his wooing mood to speak of the tinted sky, or the green fields about him, but simply asks the prosaic question, "How much is she worth?" The amount being ascertained, if he has the means, he lays it at the feet of her father, and takes her to his lodge. From that time she is his own, bought by his own money and by his own hand.

Hell (upon Earth.)—The Montana Post says that an exploring party which had been to the head waters of the Yellow Stone River, has just returned, and reports seeing one of the greatest wonders of the world. For eight days the party traveled through a volcanic country, emitting blue flame and a living stream of molten brimstone. The country was smooth and rolling, long, level plains intervening between rolling mounds. On the summits of these rolling mounds were craters from four to eight feet in diameter, and everywhere, on the level plains from four to six miles in diameter, were smaller craters from which streamed a blaze and a constant whistling sound. The hollow ground resounded beneath their feet as they travelled, and every moment seemed to break through, not a living thing was seen in the viciuity. The explorers gave it the significant appellation of "hell."

The Largest City in the World.—Jeddo, the capital of Japan, is without exception, the largest and most populous city in the world. It contains the vast number of one million five hundred thousand dwellings, and five million human beings. Many of the streets are nineteen iananeseries in length, which is equivalent to twenty-two English miles. The commerce of Jeddo far exceeds that of any other city in the world, and the sea along the coast is constantly white with sails of ships. Their vessels sail to the southern portion of the empire, where they are laden with rice, tea, sea-coal, tobacco, silk, cotton, and tropical fruits, all of which can find a ready market in the north, and then return freighted with corn, salt, and isinglass, and various other products of the the north, which have a market in the south.

Mrs. Hannah M. P. Allen, of 728 Chestnut strect, Philadelphia, testifies as follows:

Q.—Please state what, in your opinion, is the comparative merit of the Grover & Baker Machine as compared with other machines?

A.—I think it far excels any other machine for dress-making and general family use. It is especially valuable in dress-making, on account of the elastic stitch, and the ease and rapidity with which I can pass from one thickness of material to another, without changing the tension; the stitch also is more beautiful and durable than any other stich that I know of. The machine is so simple in its combination of parts and its practical operation, that it is very difficult to get it out of order, and any operative can manage it. It is the only machine which has yet succeeded in embroidery. I also like the machine above all others for hemming, tucking, cording, and I would not part with my machine for any consideration if I could not replace it.

[From testimony taken before the U. S. Commissioner of Patents, on the application for the extension of the patent for the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine.]

GREAT MEN AND SMALL CRITICS.

IN the progress of the universal leveling process that seems to be going on in the world, one of the most noticeable, as well as the most deplorable features, is the gradual and steady decay of reverence for what is superior or eminent. The rashness and flippancy of censure with which envious mediocrity revenges itself upon greatness, never before seemed to be so prevalent in polities, in literature, and in society as in our day. And it is noticeable that the criticism of the distinguished by the obscure, is no longer merely stupid, complacent, and silly, partaking more of ignorance or folly than of malice, but it has taken on, more particularly in the United States, a certain barbarous and brutal tone, as if it were imagined that clownish insolence toward great men had a tendency to elevate vulgar assailants to their level.

These remarks have been suggested by the angry and churlish strain in which a large portion of the American press has spoken of Mr. Dickens in connection with his second visit to the United States. One "leading paper" of the great city that claims to be the metropolis of the Union, sneers at the greatest novelist of the age, as a mere money-making adventurer, who after having "written himself out," comes over here to "trade upon his reputation," and make money by "exhibiting himself to the public at a dollar per head." Another reproaches him for his egregious vanity in proposing to read "his own lucubrations, instead of selections from the works of his celebrated contemporaries." A third suggests, that inasmuch as he exhibited the basest ingratitude on the occasion of his last visit, by not "cracking us up" in graceful acknowledgement of our somewhat obtrusive and annoying hospitalities, our American self-respect imperatively dictates that we should give him a particularly cold reception this time. A fourth, less fastidious, but more consistent, hints at stale vegetables and rotten eggs as appropriate testimonials of our appreciation of the English novelist's not particularly flattering delineations of certain types of American character, and certain phases of American life and society, in his "American Notes" and "Martin Chuzzlewit." The simple truth is that Dickens has treated the salient features and characteristics of our society, in precisely the same spirit in which he has dealt with the corresponding features of English society, He did not feel bound to "crack us up" in payment of the crude and obtrusive hospitalities thrust upon him by our codfish aristocracy, who ran after and endeavored to appreciate and monopolize him, not so much because they appreciated and honored his genius, as because they wished in the true spirit of vulgar parvenus, to derive some modicum of social notoriety from making him their guest and associate. In refusing this poor bribe, Dickens showed his native worth and his genuine manliness; just as in angrily resenting his satires upon American life, society, and manners, his assailants have unmistakably evinced their coarse-grained semi-civilized vanity and egotism.

Bret Harte's 'Condensed Novels."—Carleton and Co., of New York, have just published in a small volume, the humorous travesties of a number of the best known English and American novelists, by Frank Bret Harte. The book also includes a selection from the author's admirable sketches, such as "The Venerable Impostor," "My Newfoundland Dog," etc. A considerable number of these pieces appeared in the Californian, but they possess more than a local or ephemeral interest, and are well worthy of preservation in a permanent form. The New York Tribune, speaking of the travesties and sketches that compose the volume, says:

"They contain many effective hits at the mannerisms of certain celebrated writers, without the extravaganee and forced attempts at wit which makes so many productions of the kind as vapid as an uncorked bottle of Congress water. Although written, as the author confesses, for an ephemeral purpose, they exhibit qualities which entitle them to preservation in a more permanent form, and will serve as authentic illustrations of a peculiar phase of American humor."

We shall avail ourselves of an early opportunity of speaking more at length of Mr. Harte's first serious attempt at authorship.

The fourth edition of Queen Victoria's book, "The Early Days of the Prince Consort," of which a notice will be found in our "Literary Gleanings." has just been issued, and fifteen thousand copies have been sold. This fact, although not decisive as to the literary merits of the work, is sufficient evidence of its popularity.

A SOUTHERN "HOME JOURNAL."

WE have received the first number of a literary weekly, published at Baltimore, called the Southern Home Journal. A story entitled "Monksden," by John Esten Cooke, is commenced in this issue, and is illustrated in New York Ledger style. Among the remaining contents, are "Tales of the Refuges," by Professor M. Schele De Vere: "By the River," a poem, by Paul H. Hayne; and a poem by Laura Preston. Wm. Gilmore Simms, Anna Cora Mowatt, Edward A. Pollard, and Charles H. Smith, (Bill Arp,) are also announced as contributors. In size, and general appearance, the paper resembles the Sunday Mercury of this city. Unless the subsequent numbers shall exhibit a very great improvement upon the first, the Southern Home Journal will not prove a very formidable rival, so far as literary merit is concerned, of its Northern namesake. The following is an extract from the "prospectus," which, as will be seen, promises the avoidance of everything of a political nature:

"The publisher of the Southern Home Journal design making this paper strictly a literary production of the South, not in a spirit of "contention, but rather emulation," avoiding every thing of a political nature, to be devoted to the publication of choice Literature, Biography, History, Poetry, and the News of the day. Our aim will be to make the Home Journal as useful and entertaining as a paper of its kind can be made, and we shall spare neither pains nor expense in the accomplishment of our object.

"As there is not a weekly paper of this class published in the South, the publishers ask for the liberal patronage of all who feel an interest in the advancement of the South to that high standard of independence, in every respect, to which the intelligence of her people entitles her, and which she ought ever to occupy among the peoples of the world. Let it not be longer said that the Southern section of the country is dependent on Eastern enterprise for everything—even for a choice family paper."

The promise, however, to avoid irritating topics, is, we are sorry to see, violated in the same number in which it is made—unless indeed it is continued with peculiar liberality. To glorify the Confederacy and its champions, to bewail the "lost cause," and to keep alive the passions and prejudices which caused the war and were intensified by it, these, we regret to say, seem to be the leading motif traceable in several of the articles in this first number of the Southern Home Journal. If, however, its influence upon the sentiments and convictions of its readers shall be limited to the literary ability it evinces, its power for mischief will not be extensive. The following stanzas from one of the poetical contributions entitled "Save Thy People There," is a two-fold curiosity, being no less remarkable from a grammatical than from a lyrical standpoint:

We weep—but why should we weep them now?
They've gone to a blessed rest:—
Yet, methinks, I hear the Chieftain's heart
Throb wildly against his breast;
As his eye—that eagle eye—looks back
On the land he loved so dear,
And there beholds—oh, sight of woe:—
The Negro's rule—the White man's tear.

Great drops of blood weep from his heart,
From his eye the scalding tear;
And there, where once defiance sat,
Imploring looks appear:
His great heart pants, his bosom heaves.
His soul bows down in prayer:
"Ah save!" he cries: "O! Father, save;
Thy suffering People there."

A paragraph to the effect that Horace Greeley, in a fit of repentance brought on by the Republican defeat in the Maine election, had advocated the abandonment of temperance legislation, and of legal restraints upon liquor selling, has been going the rounds of the Democratic press of California. The Tribune says that "some irresponsible whisky-loving country printer" may have credited that paper with "the lot of stuff" referred to, and adds that its falsehood is so manifest that no respectable journal would copy it. Unfortunately, even the "most respectable" partizan journals that would not stoop quite so low as to manufacture a falsehood themselves, sometimes yield to the temptation of copying one which they find ready-made, when damaging to a political adversary, even where they must suspect its real character, and where it is a piece of disingenuousness to affect the contrary.

The "literary exercises" at the Antietam "dedication," seem to have been of quite a remarkable quality. One of the "poets of the day," Mr. Buhler, expresses his awe-struck consciousness of the presence of the spirit of the martyred Lincoln in the striking couplet:

"I feel a godlike presence near—
The great Emancipator's here!"

As an offset to which, the Rev. Mr. Meyer, apostrophizing the shades of the heroes whose mortal remains rest in the cemetery, exclaims:

"Antietam's liquid gem
Murmurs your requiem!"

A sale of two thousand copies of a book is required now-a-days to pay for its publication. Before the war one thousand was sufficient.

Cheap Papers.—New York seems to have been recently flooded with cheap evening papers. In the first place Mr. Sweetzer Wilson, of the Round Table, started the Evening Gazette, a three-penny tea table issue, given to small paragraphs, small gossip, and doubtful morals. Then came the promise of Mr. Dana's evening journal of a radical political stamp, for which Tammany Hall was purchased, and has since been undergoing a very general re-construction. The first number was to have made its appearance in the early part of September, but of the debut of which we have not yet received any reliable intelligence. To forestall Mr. Dana's venture, the News began an evening paper with the same title, published it at a penny, and set half the small boys in town selling it. Then leaped into the field the younger Bennet, who hurried out the Evening Telegram, also at a penny, and and set all the rest of the juveniles procurable busy in its circulation. These two journals are very Liliputian in proportions, very cheap in printing, and very vile in contents. They are a sort of daily Police Gazettes, in which crime, seductions, and prize-fights are the staple material. Their circulation has been immense, numbering nearly fifty thousand each. And now Mr. Sweetzer, in an unexplained difference with his partner, has bolted from the Gazette, precipated upon his readers and subscribers without warning, the Evening Mail, at the enormous charge (according to Eastern notions) of two cents.

The English papers are complaining of a decline in the American watch-trade in England, consequent upon the rapid increase in the manufacture of watches on this side of the Atlantic. The fact that the American watch, fabricated by machinery, is driving the foreign article out of the markets, notwithstanding the high price of labor and materials here, militates strongly against the assertion that every class of native industry needs a "prohibitory protection." Open competition, stimulating inventive ingenuity, and energizing business talent is the most effectual means of developing the legitimate manufacturing resources of an enterprising and intelligent people.

Two different modes of stating the same fact, though they do not involve the slightest contradiction, often produce very dissimilar effects upon the mind. We have before us an amusing illustration of this. The New York Journal of Commerce, in mentioning the death of a wealthy citizen of Connecticut, said that he had been for fifteen years a subscriber to that paper, during which period he had never missed reading the editorals of a single number. The Tribune states the same fact in this wise. "A gentleman in Connecticut, after reading every article in the Journal of Commerce for fifteen years, has just died."

Judge Blake, upon the expiration of his term of office as Probate Judge, as we are informed, intends to resume the practice of his profession, devoting himself to practice in the Probate Court, as a specialty. His long and thorough experience in this particular branch of the law, will give him great advantages over all competitors, and secure to him a business, the profits of which will be much greater than the salary of the office of which he has been deprived.

It is said that Harper and Brothers, have made a particularly good thing out of "the Queen's Book," and furthermore that the Queen's agent also made "a good thing" in the sale of advance sheets to the Harpers. This publishing house, by-the-way, gave a fresh illustration of the grand scale on which their business is conducted by printing, binding and publishing the work in question, one week from the day the early sheets reached New York.

We notice that "following," for "the following," is coming into very general use for newspaper purposes. The novelty is adopted blindly, and as a mere matter of fashion, by that class of imitative writers, who follow whatever example is set them, without looking into the question of its propriety in principle or according to analogy.

The Pacific Railroad Tunnel.—The Union says: The principal tunnel on the Pacific Railroad will be completed within a week, and within two weeks the railroad track will probably be extended to and through it. The track was laid two miles beyond Cisco several weeks ago. On Tuesday last the work of track laying was resumed. The tunnel is but eleven miles distant from the point of commencement, or thirteen miles beyond Cisco. It is expected that the track will be extended with but little delay to Coburn Station, and connect with the section already laid beyond the summit.

The Remains of the Late Senator McDougall.—A private letter received in this city states that the remains of the late United States Senator James A. McDongall would leave New York for San Francisco by the steamer of October 11th, due at this date. They will be interred in Lone Mountain Cemetery in accordance with the dying request of deceased.

Shipment of Treasure.—The treasure shipment by the steamship Sacramento, Wednesday, amounted to $505,957 75. $314,470 98 of it was destined for England; $186, 483 77 for New York, and $5,000 to Panama.

DRAMATIC AFFAIRS.

THE dramatic event of the week was the production of Caste, at Maguire's Opera House, on Wednesday evening. Tbis drew a good bouse and afforded a pleasing relief from the Irish drama, which has so long held possession of the boards. Caste, the latest production of tbe author of Ours, is a capital comedy; it is full of neat situations, and the dialogue is crisp and lively. There is some hope for tbe stage when such plays as Caste are written. Perbaps if authors, capable of writing comedies like this, make their appearance, the public will be in courso of timc weaned from their unhealthy love for real water, stuffed legs, real fire-engines, real pigs, cows, etc., which have done so mucb towards rendering several trashy plays successful. Every character in this play is neatly drawn; the plot is all that is required for a comedy. The "Hon. George D'Alroy" (Harry Edwards) falls in love with Esther Eccles, (Sallie Hinckley,) the daughter of a drunken old sot who spends his time in expatiating on the wrongs of the workingman, and does not believe in even eight hours work. "Estber" and her sister "Polly" (Mrs. Sophie Edwin) are engaged at a theatre as ballet dancers. Polly is in love with "Samuel Gerridge," a rising young plumber and glazier. In the first scene, "George" and "Captain Hawtree" (W. H. Hamilton) call at the Eccles' house. "Hawtree," who has a proper idea of caste, tries to persuade his friend from marrying a ballet girl, advancing as arguments against sucb a step ber low birth, and more especially her drunken father. "Eccles" (Dan Bryant) makes his appearsnce very drnnk, and the scene closes. In the second act, we find "George" and "Esther" secretly married; the "Marcbioness de St. Maur," (Mrs. Judab,) "George's" mother, wbo has married a French Marquis, arrives from Rome, and becomes acquainted with the fact of ber son's mesalliance. "George" is ordered to India on active service, and the curtain falls on the parting between the husband and wife. In the third act, "George" is supposed to have been taken prisoner and killed by the Sepoys, "Captain Hawtree," who has returned, having brought news to that effect. "Estber" is about to go on the stage once more in order to support herself and child, her father having lost all her money in betting on races. Then "George" turns up, not having been killed; "Polly" and "Gerridge" at first suppose him to be a ghost. His return is broken to "Esther," the Marchioness forgives them, "Polly" marries "Gerridge," and all ends happily. The piece was capitally played throughout. Great credit was due to Miss Sallie Hinckley for the admirable manner in whicb she played the part of "Esther Eccles," there was no straining for effect, the patbos was natural and touching and evidently moved the audience. Mrs. Sophie Edwin's "Polly" was a capital impersonation, she invested the character witb an air of jovialty and cheerfulness which was very pleasing. Dan Bryant's impersonation of "Eccles" was the most finisbed of bis performances whicb I have witnessed. His simulation of drunkness was perfect, and the manner in which he spouted poetry caused roars of laughter. Harry Edwards was rather heavy as "George D'Alroy," and W. H. Hamilton, as "Captain Hawtree," utterly failed to represent tbe character of Captain Hawtree, the heavy swell, playing the part in the style of a snbdued New York firemau. However, ho must not be blamed for this, he did his best, but it was a physical impossibility for bim to play tbe part. Willie Edouin who seldom gets a part which affords him an opportunity to display his talent as a low comedian, found one admirably suited to him in "Samuel Gerridge," and availed bimself of every opportunity which offered to make a point. Nothing could be better than his impersonation of the enthusiastic young plumber and glazier. Mrs. Judah was of course excellent as the old Marchioness. Caste should have a long run. It will be performed at the matinee to-day, and also this evening.

At the Metropolitan Theatre, on Monday and Tuesday nights, Leah was performed, with Mrs. Bates in the title role. Her impersouation of the character was highly artistic, and drew great applause from the audience. On Wednesday, Mrs. Bates took her farewell benefit, and was, I am glad to say, honored by the attendance of a large audience. Mrs. Bates has been unlucky since her arrival here, but all who have seen her give her credit for tho possession of undoubted talent. Ambition, or the Throne, the Scaffold, and the Tomb, was performed on the occasion of Mrs. Bates' benefit, the beneficiary assuming the character of "Catherine Howard." This play is terrible trash. In a republican country no opportunity of bringing kings into disrepute and ridicule should be lost. Harry Thompson caricatured Henry VIII admirably, he would have caused roars of laugbter in any burlesque. Tho part of "Catherine Howard" was played for all it was worth by Mrs. Bates. The comic scenes which enlivened this terrib'y dreary play were capitally sustained by Miss Clelia Howson and John Howson. This piece was repeated on Thursday. On Friday evening, Charles H. Faruham, the most polite and attentive doorkeeper ever known, who has studied Lord Chesterfield's letters until he has become a perfect model of suavity, took a benefit. He had, as he deserved, a capital house. The Lady of Lyons was well performed. Mrs. Bates, with the exception of two or tbree mispronunciations, acting and reading the part of "Pauline" admirably. Mr. Bates made a very heavy "Claude;" tbe other characters were well filled.

Tbis afternoon, The Lady of Lyons will be repeated. This evening, the performance will consist of The Iron Chest, witb Mr. Bates as "Sir Edward Mortimer," and Mrs. Bates in the character of "Wilford." On Monday, the drama of Ernest Maltravers will be performed, Mrs. Bates assuming tho part of "Alice Darville," and Mr. Bates that of "Richard Darville."

I understand tbat great preparations are being made to give éclat to the benefit of the talented young actress, Miss Clelia Howson, which is shortly to take place. Miss Clelia Howson is an universal favorite, and will certainly bave an overflowing house.

Of course all San Franciscans were delighted when they heard that the San Francisco Minstrels were all the rage in New York, and that their ball was thronged nightly. There was, however, mingled with this feeling of exultation, one of regret that our San Francisco Minstrels bad not been offered sufficient inducements to make them remain here. It has been long since San Francisco has enjoyed a first-class minstrel entertainment, and it is not to be wondered at that Congress Hall is far too small to contain the crowds who nightly flock to the New Temple of Music, to enjoy tbe entertainment given by Leslie, Raynor and Smith. This entertainment is unanimously pronounced the most perfect thing of tbe kind ever given in this city. Leslie's songs, Raynor's eccentric performances, Henri Herberte's beautiful ballads, and other attractions, suffice to crowd the hall nightly. During tbe ensuing week an entirely new programme will be performed. A matinee will be given to-day, and this evening a programme introducing several novelties will be performed.

Charles Wheatleigh is on board the steamer from Panama which is expected to arrive to-day. He intends, if possible, once more to assume the management of a theatre in San Francisco. He has several new plays never produced in this city. The public will gladly welcome Mr. Wheatleigh back.

TOUCHSTONE.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—Many important additions have of late been added to the splendid zoological collection at these gardens. The dromedary, though not as beautiful as the camel, attracts much attention. The South American lions are most beautiful animals, the bears, monkeys, and other beasts are all in fine condition, and on tbe best of terms with the crowds of persons who daily visit them. A fine instrumental concert will be given to-day, and to-morrow the usual sacred concert will take place.

ANATOMICAL MUSEUM.—It is worth tbe while of everyone to become a little acquainted with tbe internal arrangements of his body, to learn where his heart is, how bis liver is situated, and so on. This useful knowledge can be acquired by paying a visit to the Anatomical Museum. Every evening an instructive lecture is delivered.

ANOTHER YOSEMITE.—At a recent meeting of the California Academy of Natural Sciences, Professor Whitney exhibited photographs and stereoscopes of sections of the State visited by the State geological survey, including Hatchhatchi Valley, on the Tuolumne, about ten miles north of Yosemite. The valley is very picturesque, and has been occupied for some years by one Sharkey, who has made his claim there. Little or no public mention has been made of it, yet the falls are 1,700 feet.

NEW COLLEGE.—The San Jose Mercury is informed that the agents of the Episcopal diocese of New York are about to erect a College to cost $100,000, on grounds donated by Gen. Naglee, near San Jose. The Campbellites, or Disciples, have also purchased a tract of land near the Fair grounds, for the purpose of building thereon a seminary of learning.

SOMETHING NEW.—The Appeal says: We understand that the Marysville Gas Works are consuming the castor bean cake for making gas, and that it sells for $20 per ton. This is a profitable substitute for coal and pitch pine, as it leaves the cash at home heretofore sent abroad.

APPARENT DEATH.—The Mendocino Herald says, Mrs. Higgins, residing at the Half Way House, has been ill for some time, and on Monday last, to all appearances, she died, and while in the act of laying her out she came to, and up to this time is in a fair way of recovery.

RAILROAD RECEIPTS.—Tho five Railroad Companies of this city return $78,488, receipts for the month of September, an excess of $2,845 over August. Total receipts for nine months, ending September 30th, $607,860.

THE Solano Press is informed that $2,706,000 has been paid out for grain at Maino Prairie, in that county this year.

GAS WORKS.—Tbe city of Los Angeles is about to be lighted with gas to bo manufactured from asphaltum.

NEW CHURCHES.—A new Catholic Church, "St. Peter's," on Columbia street, near Park, to the southward of Mission Dolores, will be dedicated to-morrow, by the Most Reverend Archbishop Allemany, the dedicating sermon will be preached by Reverend Father Pendergast. St. Peter's Church is to be placed under the care of Father Joseph Gallagher. This makes the tenth Catholic church in San Francisco, exclusive of the Convent and Hospital Chapels. The congregation of St. Patrick's Church also contemplate erecting a new edifice, and have purchased a frontage of 110 feet on the north side of Mission street, between Third and Fourth, with that object in view. The property purchased extends back to Jessie street, giving a depth of 160 feet and a frontage on both streets. We learn that the consideration paid for tbe above property was $44,000. The improvements on it were valued at $12,000, leaving tbe value of tbe land at $32,000, As soon as practical the buildings on the ground will be removed, and the construction of tbe new church will be commenced. Tbe society intend erecting an edifice that will be both a source of pride and ornament to tbe city.

THE CONCERT AT ZION CHURCH.—The concert given at Zion Church, last Tuesday evening, was well attended, and was not only a success in a pecuniary point of view, but gave entire satisfaction to the large assembly present, which included a large number of white citizens. Selections from Il Trovatore formed an important feature in the programme. Several choruses from this opera were sung very creditably, and one from Ernani received tremendous applause. The duet from Norma was the gem of the evening. During the evening one of the ladies sang Il Bacio extremely well. Tbe programme evinced taste, and its execution was good throughout. M'lle Stella Bonheur was among the audience, and seemed well pleased with tbe efforts of tbe singers to produce opera music. As a whole, tbe concert was a great success.

REAL ESTATE TRANSACTIONS FOR OCTOBER.—The month of October was a very brisk one in real estate transactions. The total sales shown are in advance of 31 over those of September, and the money which passed at them an increase of $215,331 over the figures of the last named month. In the 50-varas section, as compared with September, 18 more sales took place, and $305,067 more changed hands. In the 100-varas there was an increase of 4 in the number of sales, while the amount of money which passed was practically the same. Tbe city slip and water lots sales show a falling off of five in the sales, and of $89,606 in amount. Soutb Beach transactions reach about the same figures as those of last month, while the adjacent Potrero has enjoyed an unusual share of attention, there being an increase over September transactions of 14 in the number of sales, and $39,778 in the total amount which passed. There was an increase of 17 in tho Mission sales, while, owing to tho property being less generally valuable, there was no increase over tbo amount paid out in September by buyers there. Although nearly all the Beideman deeds were given previous to October, and only a few appear in its transactions, there is still an increase both in the number and value of sales in the Western Addition in October, as compared with the previous month. This increase comes to six in the number of sales, and to $16,154 in their value. Eligible lots in this section are more difficult to be had at present, and are held at firmer prices than any other class of private property in the city.—San Francisco Real Estate Circular.

ADVERTISING—ITS BENEFITS.—"S. T. 1860, X."—A great many wonder what these characters mean. They are seen in all the Eastern papers, and are painted in large white letters on the fences all along the various railroad lines. The Des Moines Register gives the following definition: "It is just Drake's phonetic way of telling the following sentence: "Started Trado in 1860 with Ten Dollars." There is a good deal of meaning embodiedi n that sentence. It tells the world that a man starting with $10, has, by the aid of advertising, made a fortune of two millions in seven years. By wide spread and liberal advertising, tho compound, whatever its merits, has made its proprietor immensely rich. There's a rapid multiplication table which some of you close-fisted economists, who have big capitals but no incomes, had better study. If ten dollars, in seven years, can be advertised into two million dollars, hadn't you better introduce the proposition into your commercial arithmetic?"

INSURANCE RECEIPTS.—Ten of the local Insurance Companies return $235,210 (currency basis) receipts for tbe month of September; $13,396 less than for August. Total receipts from January 1st to September 30th, $1,730,182.

THE total vote of Montana Territory, in tho late election, was 11,662. This is larger than tbat of the State of Nevada.

LOISETTE.

IT was a divine May morning when I set out to walk to Summerfield, and I felt more hopeful of success than I had ever done before. I had determined that that day should decide my fate. All through the winter and the early spring I had loved Loisette, and a hundred times I had longed and yearned to tell her so, and to ask her to be my wife, and each time something—I could hardly say what—struck me silent.

She liked me, I knew, but did she love me? Something in her eyes seemed to lead me to hope she did; such eyes they were, loving, and tender, and shy. When I looked into their soft depths, all the most delightful description of eyes I had ever read used to come across me, "les portes de l'amour," "des bluets doux comme les yenx;" above all, Calderon's tender refrain,

Sweetest eyes were ever seen.

When she looked at me with those eyes, then it seemed to me I might "tell her all that was in my heart,' and take her to mine unforbidden. But the next moment, as if she guessed and half feared my thought, she turned away slyly, and her manner altered, and my heart shrunk back in fear and sorrow.

But at last I felt I could endure this suspense no longer. I must know the best or the worst. If she were to be mine, such a home and such a life as I had planned, and hoped, and dreamt of ever since I first knew her, and should be prepared; if she were not for me, then I should leave England, and break away from that and all other home ties, and try to bear it like a man somewhere away from all that should unman me.

But that May-day, as I started forth and walked along briskly through the up and down lanes of the lovely Hertfordshire country; now, shut in between banks tufted with ferns, overrun with the exquisite small leaved ivy, crowned with lavish May; now, emerging upon sweeps of hill and dips of valley, crossing commons ablaze with gorse, traversing woodland paths where bluebells spread their sheets of azure, and lingering primroses starred mossy banks; Heaven! how I remember it all! That May-day hope seemed as strong and as full of spring and life and vigor, as my own limbs. I strode on, thinking of the eyes that would look up their soft welcome to mine, and of the warm little hand that I should clasp, and perhaps then claim as mine, my very own, while life should last. It seemed to me that such feelings could not but be prophetic.

"If I find her in the garden," I thought, "I will look upon it as a good omen; I will not let the time go by, I will seize the opportunity and speak to her at once."

I got to the cottage and opened the garden gate. As I stepped inside I saw her, a little way down the path, in her dainty morning gown and broad garden hat, filling the basket that hung on her arm, with flowers, and softly singing to herself. I stopped on the lawn; I wanted to come upon her unawares, and test the effect of my sudden appearance, which I could not do if the sound of my foot on the gravel should betray my approach: thus I got close to her before she knew I was near. She started violently, and the color rushed to her cheek. The slightest thing would bring it—I have seen her flush at the sudden rising of a bird from the thicket. The next moment she smiled and held out her hand. "Oh, it is you! You startled me. I had no idea anybody was near," and the sweet eyes were raised to mine trustingly. "Won't you come in?"

"Not if I may stay out—unless you are tired?"

"Oh no, I am never tired of being in the garden. So you'll help me to gather my flowers; see, you can reach up to those sprays of honeysuckle; get some of the best, the rosiest, for me."

"Ah, how delicious!" she said, inhaling the fragrance with deep ecstatic inspirations, and she held up to me the blossom that had just touched her face. I kissed the flower; I took the hand that held it; I told her all I had to tell. She stood still, her head bent so that the hat hid her face from me, and I knew not in what spirit she listened till a sigh that was half a sob checked me.

She looked up with a face so full of pain, of pity, of perplexity, of deprecating appeal, that though the hope in my heart sank down, I almost felt more for the sorrow in her face than for that in my own soul.

"Forgive me," she said. "I am so grieved. I did not know that you—that you cared for me that way. I have been engaged these two years. He is in India, and coming back in August. Oh, you don't think I have been coquettish—that I have been knowingly leading you on to this—do you?" In her earnestness she laid her hand on mine, and lifted her face with a tremulous mouth, and eyes brimful of tears.

If I had died for it, I must have snatched the consolation the moment offered—the last, the only one. I drew her on my heart, holding her close, close; and I stilled the quivering of the lips with twenty kisses.

When I released her, she turned her back to me, hid her face in her hands, and sobbed till her frame shook.

"Loisette, Loisette, forgive me! I could not help it! I could not help it! I swear I could not help it, Loisette!"

She shook her head.

"Loisette, think how I love you; think what I feel in knowing all the hope I had of you is gone—gone for ever! Loisette, I am going away, where I can never offend you more. Think that what I have done was done in parting with you for the last time—a last farewell, Loisette."

She tried to speak, but sobs made her inarticulate, still I knew she was bitterly reproaching me.

"Yes; I know I have no right to expect forgiveness. I will go. I won't distress you further. But we have at least been friends, dear, and you cannot think of that, and let me go for ever, without one word."

Still she was silent. I paused and waited; then I flung up my arms, as a man does who has lost all; and with a great groan I turned to leave her. I heard her move, I heard her attempt to speak, and I looked back. Her face was still averted, still covered with one hand. But the other was held out to me, and springing back I took it reverently, and bent my lips upon it.

"God for ever bless you, Loisette, the one and only woman in His earth for me!"

"And God bless you, and comfort you," she said. "I wish I could have been a better friend to you—I meant to be. Always believe that."

"I will, I do."

And so Loisette and I parted. The May morning was darkened as I passed through the garden gate again. I turned my steps I knew not whither—away, away, where no one could see me. That was the only wish or instinct I had.

I walked miles, seeking rest, and finding none. At last I stopped at a gate, and leaned my arms on it, and looked blindly over the wide landscape spread before me.

As I gazed, a dull numbness fell on my sorrow, and my perceptions of outward objects slowly returned.

I watched some children gathering blossoms of the May, and thought what a pity it was they should tear the boughs down so, and destroy so much to secure so little. I watched a stealthy cat creeping through the long undulations of the grass, on the hunt for poor little tender young rabbits. Up sprang a lark, bursting into ripples of song, and my eye followed him, rising, hovering, rising again, pausing, balancing on the wing, soaring up once more, darting away obliquely, resting awhile, but always singing—singing as if he could not cease for his life—then dashing down like a stone and vanishing.

And then my great grief seized me once more, and I dropped on the turf and hid my face in my arms, and cried as I never cried since I was a boy, when my mother died, and when I thought the world held no more happiness for me.

When our great griefs fall on us, we treat them as boys do bonfires. It seems that they cannot burn fiercely enough; we heap on them everything that comes to our hand in the way of fuel; all the tenderest recollections, all the most blessed anticipation, that made the joy and glory of our lives—that were as wings, lifting us above the earth we trod on. All these are brought out from the storehouse of memory and thrown on the pile, or what seems to us so, and we feel a bitter relish in the anguish, and seek to make it more, rather than less, as we stir the heap into fiercer conflagration.

Ah me! Ah me! what a miserable fool I had been, and how was I punished!

I had thought, when in my hopefulness that morning I had contemplated the whole affair, that I had been prepared for this possibility, and could bear it. But strangely, it had never entered into my calculations that if Loisette were not for me, it could be that she was promised to another; there was the sting, the thing so impossible to endure without every fibre of my heart being torn by the agonies of jealousy, in addition to grief. Loisette engaged, Loisette with no love for me, all her love for another! Loisette thinking of him, writing to him, calling him all those tender names that lips like hers seemed made to utter! And in August—in three months—he was coming back, doubtless to claim his bride!

At that thought I sprang up, as if a serpent had arisen from the green turf and stung me. I started away so far that it was not till dark that, utterly worn out and exhausted, I reached home. I shall never forget that night, nor the waking in the morning, after a couple of hours' dead sleep.

That day I wrote to my cousin, Sir Edward Haldane, who had just been appointed governor of New Brunswick, to offer myself as his private secretary: a post he had suggested my taking when his nomination to the place had first been talked of. The answer came. He would be delighted; in less than a fortnight I left England.

"I am so grieved," Mrs. Hamilton had written before this, "so grieved in every way." I had not been wrong, then, in fancying I had had her good wishes. "I should have been so glad to have bidden you God speed by word of mouth before you went, but I feel I ought not to ask you to come. Anyway, you have our best wishes, now and ever." Not a word from Loisette. Well, better so. What could she say?

I often look back now on my sojourn in that black miserable raw colony, ice-bound for half the year, sun-scorched for a few weeks, with something like a shudder.

The great cold staring barrack of a Government House with its flat unshaded gardens; the unpicturesque village that was the seat of Government, and prided itself accordingly; the country was nothing but dense forest, bare, clearing, studded with blackened stumps or quaking morasses! The interminable winter, white, still, silent, fettered with a frost that was unrelenting as death, that chilled the blood and nipped the flesh into blains, and checked the current of life in the veins of childhood, of age, and of all tender beings!

Oh, the desolation of those winter forests! No tongue can tell it! No breeze, no voice of bird, no rustle of leaf, no color; a broad white floor, a hard blue roof, black stiff pine trees standing up motionless and stark. All so like my own life in desolateness! only this nature felt no pain!

I stayed there till the sickly tardy spring, often driven back by fresh snow-falls, came to loosen the spell that winter had laid on the suffering land, and then I resolved to bear it no longer, and come what might, to return to England, and learn tidings of Loisette. It seemed to me that anything would be more endurable than this dead silence regarding her.

So I turned my back on New Brunswick for evermore, and reached England in March; March, wild and gusty, but at least alive with birds singing, and grass and buds upshooting in field and hedgerow.

I went at once into Hertfordshire. I dared not go to Mrs. Hamilton's; I dared not ask anything about the family, lest I should learn what I had come there to know.

I wandered about among the lanes where we used to wander, hoping, dreading, longing, oh, how intensely! At last I came upon Loisette and her sister. I did not meet them, but a turn of the road brought me in sight of them, walking slowly before me. Loisette, Loisette! Just as of old, the undulating figure, the head now bent pensively now poised lightly on the flexible throat, the shining masses of hair coiled below the quiet little black hat. O Loisette, Loisette! How my heart went out to you! Loisette, my love! Loisette, my darling!

I hastened my steps: I must see her once more, must look into her eyes, must hear the tones of her voice, let the cost be what it would.

As I approached, she turned with a start, a look half expectant, half alarmed; she felt who was coming, and the blood rushed over her face and neck and brow. Mrs. Hamilton, following her sister's movement, was the first to speak; she came forward, both hands extended, with joyous welcome; then Loisette greeted me with shy kindness passed to the other side of her sister, and walked on silently: while Mrs. Hamilton questioned me as to my travels, my movements, my plans.

"You'll come and see us, you will promise? I know you are a man of your word, and that if you promise, you will keep your word. Come and dine to-morrow, will you?"

I promised. I could not be more miserable than I was, and I must learn all I wanted to know. But I would not go to dinner; I remembered too well the last time I had dined there, so I said I would go in the morning.

When I entered the drawing-room, what a rush of memories at sight of the familiar place, of the two women sitting by the fire as they had a year ago—all but I apparently unchanged!

I know not how it all came about, but in a few minutes I found myself making one in the circle as of old. I could not speak. Loisette, too, was silent. Mrs. Hamilton talked for us all.

Presently she glanced at the clock on the mantlepiece. "Three already! You must excuse me. Dear! I shall barely be in time to meet Mrs. L. at the station. You won't go, or I shall think you are offended. When shall we see you again? Settle it with Loisette. Good bye. No, à revoir!" And she was gone, and Loisette and I were sitting side by side, silent.

Loisette was sitting, very pale and calm, looking into the fire.

"Loisette!"

She gave an almost imperceptible start, her color rose slightly, and she turned her eyes on me for a moment—I could not tell whether in reproach or mere surprise—and then resumed her gaze on the fire.

"Miss Vane—are you still Miss Vane?"

"Yes."

"When—how long?" I could not find words in which to put the question.

"When am I going to be married? you would ask," she said, with a calm that was almost rigid. "I am not going to be married. I have been jilted."

"You jilted Loisette!"

"Do you pity me? Don't. I am glad of it; glad, at least to be free; glad that I have nothing to blame myself for, in obtaining my freedom. Long before I gained it I felt we had made a mistake, and while I was thinking of how I might suggest the idea to—to him, he cut the knot by marrying a half caste damsel with several lakhs of rupees. Though what sort of a fortune that may be, I have not the faintest conception." A faint gleam of the old sweet archness came across her face.

I bent forward, looking with all my heart in my eyes on the soft half averted profile, watching the conscious blood rising slowly. I laid my hand on the little cold rigidly clasped hands; I felt them relaxing; gently my arm wound itself round her waist; her head dropped on my shoulder, nestled there, and was still.

So we sat, until the pony carriage stopped at the gate. Mrs. Hamilton came in in a somewhat demonstrative manner. She glanced at Loisette, then at me, and understood it all.

"So you bore my absence with what equanimity you might!" she said, lifting her bright face to mine, with a world of congratulation in her eyes. "Now you'll stay to dinner."

Loisette turned and fled.

"God bless you, you dear woman!" I said. "I never expected to be so glad to get rid of you as I was an hour ago."

"And God bless you! It was you I wanted for a brother all along. I always hated the notion of Loisette marrying that man. Poor child, she did not know her own heart, and was persuaded into accepting him! If she had listened to me, she would have thrown him over long ago; but she was too conscientious while she thought he loved her. Perhaps it's better as it is? I will tell you something. She knows there is no mistake this time."

The Dayton (O.) Journal tells a good story illustrative of style. A few months ago a gentleman moved to the eity and purehased a niee property, and among other things to contribute to his eonvenienee and comfort, proeured a fine horse and a very genteel earriage. A "likely colored boy" was employed at a fair salary to take eharge of the establishment, and diseharge the numerous duties which arise around a well regulated homestead. For a time things went on smoothly with "Chores," but latterly he seemed out of spirits, and seldom smiled. His employer observed this despondent demeanor of "Chores," and he was determined to get at the bottom of it. Perhaps he was in love! But no matter. Taking "Chores" aside, one day, when he looked more gloomy than usual, he inquired considerately what it was that ailed him. "Well, you see, mas'r," began "Chores," in a sort of tragie style, "you's got but one hoss, while all de gentlemen 'bout hea has two ; an' all de boys da calls mo a one-hoss nigger ; an' as I ean't stan' dat, I speets I'll have for to resign. I likes you fuss rate, mas'r, an' I'd like to say if you had two hosses, but you see how it is—de boys dey ean't quit hollering, 'Dere go that one hoss nigger!'" Not wishing to lose the serviees of so valuable an assistant, a seeond horse was purchased, and "Chores" became a two-hoss nigger."

Taylor's Saloon.—This quiet retreat on Third street, a fow doors from Market, has long heen the most popular resort for gentlemen of taste in liquid luxuries of auy saloon south of Moutgomery street. Taylor has achieved more than mero local famo for the purity of his beverages and the superiority of his brands of ale. His lunches, also, are the very embodiment of good luuches. If you want good cheer, go to "Taylor's," No. 16 Third street, southwest side.

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL
ON FILING A PETITION.
UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four square leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead ; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner porperty worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.
BROOKS & MERRITT,
No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.
N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsed vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say : "It is, therefore, now the settled law, that the municipal lands held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."
Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.

AMERICAN EXCHANGE
Is now and will continue as it ever has been, the most comfortable, homelike, quiet and economical Hotel in the tate. TIMOTHY SARGENT, Proprietor.

A GENTLEMAN went into one of our fashionable barber-shops, the other day, to get shaved, was waited on by an exquisite tonsorial artist' who is a noted wag, and who never lets an opportunity for a joke pass him if he can help it. He proceeded to operate upon the face of the gentleman, who by the way, like Judge Douglas with his legs, had "a mighty poor show" of beard. The barber, in a quiet, patronizing sort of a way, inquired of the gentleman why he did not raise a moustache. "For the simple reason, because I can't," rather brusquely responded the gentleman. "I think you might, if you were to try," persisted the barber, very blandly. "Utterly impossible, I tell you," impatiently insisted the gentleman. "Oh, no!" said the barber, giving him a light touch with the lather on the end of the brush, "Oh no!" I am certain, sir, you could raise a moustache —a light summer moustache!" (Exit knight of the raiser.)

DURING the cross-examination of a false witness at the Tombs the other day, the District Attorney asked him where his father was; to which the witness responded, with a melancholy air—"Dead, sir; dropped off very suddenly, sir." "How came he to drop off suddenly?" was the next question. "Foul play, sir; the sheriff imposed upon his unsuspicious nature, sir, and, getting him to go on a platform to take a look at a select audience, suddenly knocked a trap-door from under him, sir."

CHARLES LAMB tells this characteristic story of Hazlitt: "I took him to see a very pretty girl, where there were two young girls; they neither laughed nor sneered, nor giggled, nor whispered, but they were young girls; and he sat and frowned blacker and blacker, indignant that there should be such things as youth and beauty, till he tore me away before supper in perfect misery, and owned that he could not bear young girls, they drove him mad."

A "LOVELY GIRL," in Wisconsin, recently recovered fourteen hundred dollars damages in a breach of promise suit against a perfidious lover. Her lawyer congratulated her on the amount, when she exclaimed, with a ferocious glance at the mulcted defendant, and nervously clenching her fingers, "I'd give every penny of it just to have one good pull at his hair!"

THE bulletins of fashion state that "some of the ladies now wear long ribbons on their bonnets, to the ends of which tiny bells are attached." This is doubtless to notify their admirers that they have no objection to a ring.

A CROWDED horse-car—First passenger: (to sturdy laborer standing in front of him,) "I say there! I've got toes!" Second passenger: "Y-e-s, (a gleam of intelligence lightens his face,) I felt 'em!"

THE SNUG.—"The Snug" has been located one door below Maguire's Opera House, for ten years past. It was established for the convenience of the habituates of the Opera House, and has the reputation of dispensing the best wines and liquors in the city, under the charge of its present proprietor, Mr. Timothy McCarty. Entrances from various parts of the Opera House to the bar have been cut, for the convenience of the public. Mr. McCarty gives his entire attention to his guests, and renders his establishment a "Snug" place by day or night.

Old apple jack and cherry.
La Rose, Chablis, and Burgundy
Both white, and red and sightly,
Prime Hermitage of ripe old age,
Still, sparkling too and sprightly.
Sauterne, medoc, still sparkling hock,
Johannesberg, Hockheimer,
Then sirs and dames (these German names
Would craze an English rhymer!)
Just come and buy, and cease to sigh
For Egypt and its fleshpots;
Ne'er better fare did Pharoh share,
Or any other despots.

The Ladies are of one mind in pronouncing BOWMAN'S AMERICAN WASHING COMPOUND the best preparation for washing and cleaning in use. It is acknowledged to be a saving both in money and labor. The Compound softens the dirt, consequently the clothes require not more than one-half the rubbing necessary in washing by the old method; besides all who give it a trial acknowledge that their clothes are made whiter in washing with this Compound, than they were ever known to be by using any other preparation. For washing Woolen Goods and Flannels it cannot be equaled. Calicoes that can be washed with soap, without fading, are washed in the water used for boiling the white clothes. This Compound has been used in the eastern States for the past three years with perfect success. Warranted not to injure the clothes. For sale by all Grocers.

A PIE-BAKER in Boston, the other day, had left his cart, stocked with several baskets of pies, standing in the street. Another horse and vehicle stood in the rear. Dobbin of the latter, nosing the good things in front, gradually worked his way up, and poking his nose in the basket, discovered and demolished in short order half a dozen berry pies, licking the plates, and then "chawing" the paper which covered them. He smacked his chops after his pieous meal with evident satisfaction. Not so the pie-vender when he emerged from his customer's cellar, and found himself minus half a dozen pies. A slap in the face and a backing out were Dobbin's penalty.

"TALK about mean men," said old Fax, "why, there's that Bill Johnson, he's the meanest man I ever heard tell on. Bill was a constable here. Why, don't you think he had an execution against me for a little matter of groceries, and he came out and levied on my old woman's ducks, and wanted me to drive 'em up and catch' em for him, and I told him to catch 'em himself; and so he chased 'em round and round the house, and every time he'd catch a duck he'd sit down and wring its head off, and charge mileage."

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFTEENTH Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco.

MARY ANN LEEDOM, Plaintiff, vs. FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and the Complaint filed in said city and county of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send Greeting to FRANCIS LEEDOM, Defendant.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, and to answer the Complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this summons, if served within this county; or if served out of this county, but in this District, within twenty days; otherwise within forty days; or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between plaintiff and defendant, awarding the care and custody of her daughter Julia to plaintiff, and allowing her to resume her maiden name.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 7th day of August, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the estate of JOHN L. TAGGARD, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of E. W. Taggard, the administrator of the estate of John L. Taggard, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is ordered, That all persons interested in the estate of the said John L. Taggard, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the City and County of San Francisco, at the Court room of said Court, in the City Hall, in said City and County, on TUESDAY, the 19th day of November, A. D. 1867, at two o'clock P. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the heirs of the said John L. Taggard, deceased, according to law:

And it is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said nineteenth day of November, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said City and County.

In the matter of the Estate of HENRY BENTZ, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of sale of real estate should not be made.

It appearing in the said Court, by the petition this day presented and filed by William A. Quarles, the Administrator of the estate left unadministered of Henry Bentz, deceased, praying for an order of sale of real estate, that it is necessary to sell some portion of the real estate, to pay the debts, expenses and charges of the administration.

It is therefore ordered by the said Court, that all persons interested in the estate of said deceased, appear before the said Probate Court on TUESDAY, the 26th day of November, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock in the forenoon of said day, at the Court room of said Probate Court, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased, as shall be necessary.

And that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

Dated October 24th, 1867.

IN THE PROBATE COURT, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of JEAN VICTOR SUBERVEILLE, deceased.

On reading and filing the petition of Lucas Ponton de Arce, Administrator of the said estate, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of the Administrator to pay the debts, charges and expenses of administration, and that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said deceased for the payment of such debts, charges and expenses, and because after the sale of so much of said estate as shall be necessary to pay such debts, charges and expenses, the residue thereof would be of such a character with reference to its future disposition among the heirs of said deceased as clearly to render it for the best interest of all concerned that the same should be sold, and for other reasons set forth in said petition.

It is ordered that all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court, at the Court room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the 25th day of November, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock A. M., of that day, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the said deceased as shall be necessary.

And it is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the city and county aforesaid.

A Rum Expedient.—A student at Trinity, Dublin, a man of considerable ability, who, but for a disposition to indulge in drink, would have swept the college of all its prizes, after repeated acts of insubordination originating in this unhappy fault, calls to the board, fines, etc, only escaped formal rustication by a pledge solemnly given to his tutor, accompanied by a convention that he was to have the daily privilege of one tumbler of punch, never to be exceeded except if wet through and thoroughly soaked, when a second might be taken. Now he, not having that confidence in the climate of his native country that he might have fairly possessed, conceived the idea of aiding nature, and might be spied toward six of an afernoon, standing on the steps of his chamber, while his servant, with a watering-pot, performed the part of Pluvius from a window overhead, after which he would return to the company, and beg them to note the condition he was in, and be able to bear testimony, if called upon that he was in the predicament specified in the act, and eligible for another tumbler.

Jones was traveling with his wife, and was so gallant in his behavior to his carasposa that madame became uneasy, and remonstrated against his attentions as too marked for public observation. "The deuce," said Jones; "we're married, I suppose?" "Yes," said the lady; "but, judging by your deportment, folks will think we are not." "Well, what of it?" "Why, not much to you," said the careful dame. "You are a man, but we women have our characters to take care of."

This is the only exclusive Tea, Wine and Spirit Store on the Pacific Coast.

It is neither a saloon or sample room, (as no wine or spirits are permitted to be drank on the premises,) but a depot where selected Teas and Pure Wines and Spirits may be procured at wholesale or retail for medicinal and family use. In this respect it is our aim to vie with Blasinger & Co., New York, Bigelow & Dawes, London, and Cozzens & Co., of Washington, where every facility is offered to ladies as well as gentlemen in making their own selections and purchases in quantities to suit.

N. B.—Our Treatise on Wines, Spirits and Teas, may be had at our depot gratis, and will be mailed to consumers and dealers in the interior when requested.

AYER'S PILLS

ARE PARTICULARLY ADAPTED to derangements of the Digestive Apparatus, and diseases arising from impurity of the Blood. A large part of all the complaints that afflict mankind originate in one of these, and consequently these PILLS are found to cure many varieties of Disease. They are sugar-coated, and hence may be taken readily by the most sensitive and delicate persons.

Subjoined are the statements from some eminent physicians, of their effects in their practice:

AS A FAMILY PHYSIC.

From Dr. E. W. Cartwright, of New Orleans—Your Pills are the prince of purges. Their excellent qualities surpass any cathartic we possess. They are mild, but very certain and effectual in their action on the bowels, which makes them invaluable to us in the daily treatment of disease.

FOR JAUNDICE AND ALL LIVER COMPLAINTS.

From Dr. Theodore Bell, of New York City—Not only are your Pills admirably adapted to their purpose as an aperient, but I find their beneficial effects upon the Liver very marked, indeed. They have in my practice proved more effectual for the cure of Bilious Complaints than any one remedy I can mention. I sincerely rejoice that we have at length a purgative which is worthy the confidence of the profession and the people.

DYSPEPSIA—INDIGESTION.

From Dr. Henry J. Knox, of St. Louis—The Pills you were kind enough to send me have been all used in my practice, and have satisfied me that they are truly an extraordinary medicine. So peculiarly are they adapted to the diseases of the human system, that they seem to work upon them alone. I have cured some cases of Dyspepsia and Indigestion with them, which had resisted the other remedies we commonly use. Indeed I have experimentally found them to be effectual in almost all the complaints for which you recommend them.

FOR HEADACHE—SICK HEADACHE—FOUL STOMACH—PILES—DROPSY—PLETHORA—PARALYSIS—FITS—DYSENTERY—DIARRHŒA—RELAXATION, Etc., Etc.

From Dr. Edward Boyd, Baltimore—Dear Dr. Ayer: I cannot answer you what complaints I have cured with your Pills better than to say all that we ever treat with a purgative medicine. I place great dependence on an effectual cathartic in my daily contest with disease, and believe as I do that your Pills afford us the best we have, I of course value them highly.

☞ Most of the Pills in market contain mercury, which although a valuable remedy in skillful hands, is dangerous in a public pill. From the dreadful consequences that frequently follow its incautious use. These contain no mercury or mineral substances whatever.

Prepared by DR. J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by all Druggists and Dealers in Medicine everywhere.

THE DEW OF EDEN.

LADIES OF CALIFORNIA?—If you will keep your complexions in the freshness, delicacy and beauty of youth, you must use the DEW OF EDEN, for it is the only article extant that will do for those using it all that it purports without injury, as it contains no mineral or poisonous substances whatever. It preserves the skin from the effects of climate and atmospheric changes; prevents the formation of Freckles, Tan, Morphew, Sunburn and Wrinkles. It keeps the skin soft, tender and beautiful; because it is congenial and natural to it, and composed of ingredients that supply to it what time and exposure take too rapidly away. It preserves and restores. It is valuable to the young, but more so to those from whom the stern hand of Time is stealing the treasures of youth; to such, it will actually arrest its depredations and avert its ravages upon the human face divine. It will surely smooth out those lines of care to a great extent, and restore the skin to comparative youth. Used on the hands daily, it preserves them in all fineness of texture and delicacy of early years. It gives a beautiful tint to the nails of the fingers, and keeps them tender and soft. It is not a cosmetic, and must not be used with any kind of paint. A simple powder, however, of harmless nature, may be used without detriment with this protective.

No lady once using the DEW OF EDEN will ever afterward dispense with it from her toilet.

PRIVATE MEDICAL AID.

QUICK CURES AND MODERATE CHARGES.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY,

PRIVATE MEDICAL AND SURGICAL INSTITUTE,

Sacramento Street, below Montgomery, Opposite Pacific Mail Steamship Co's Office, Private Entrance on Leidesdorff Street,

San Francisco.

Established expressly to afford the afflicted sound and scientific Medical Aid, in the treatment and cure of all Private and Chronic Diseases, cases of Secrecy, and all Sexual Disorders.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

DR. W. K. DOHERTY returns his sincere thanks to his numerous patients for their patronage and would take this opportunity to remind them that he continues to consult at his Institute for the cure of chronic diseases of the Lungs, Liver, Kidneys, Digestive and Genito-Urinary Organs, and all Private Diseases, viz: Syphilis in all its forms and stages, Seminal Weakness, and all the horrid consequences of Self-Abuse, Gonorrhœa, Gleet, Strictures, Nocturnal and Diurnal Emissions, Sexual Debility, Diseases of the Back and Loins, Inflammation of the Bladder and Kidneys, etc; and he hopes that his long experience and successful practice will continue to insure him a share of public patronage. By his practice of many years in Europe and the United States, he is enabled to apply the most efficient and successful remedies against diseases of all kinds. He uses no mercury, charges moderate, treats his patients in a correct and honorable way, and has references of unquestionable veracity from men of known respectability and high standing in society. All parties consulting him, by letter or otherwise, will receive the best and gentlest treatment, and implicit secresy.

TO FEMALES.

When a female is in trouble, or afflicted with disease, as weakness of the back and limbs, pain in the head, dimness of sight, loss of muscular power, palpitation of the heart, irritability, nervousness, extreme urinary difficulties, derangement of digestive function, general debility, vaginitis, all disease of the womb, hysteria, sterility, and all other diseases peculiar to females, she should go or write at once to the celebrated female doctor, W. K. DOHERTY, at his Medical Institute, and consult him about her troubles and disease. Irregularities, suppressions, etc., will receive the Doctor's most particular attention. Let no false delicacy prevent, but apply immediately and save yourself from painful suffering and premature death. Ladies whose delicate health or other circumstances prevent an increase in their families, should write or call at DR. DOHERTY'S MEDICAL INSTITUTE, and they will receive every possible relief and help. The Doctor's offices, consisting of a suite of six rooms, are so arranged that he can be consulted without fear of observation.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Patients (male or female) residing in any part of the State, however distant, who may desire the opinion and advice of DR. W. K. DOHERTY on their respective cases, and who think proper to submit a written statement of such, in preference to holding a personal interview, are respectfully assured that their communications will be held most sacred. Dr. Doherty takes this opportunity of observing that all letters are only opened and replied to by himself, and the latter as promptly as possible.

If the case be fully and candidly described, personal communication will be unnecessary, as instructions for diet, regimen, and the general treatment of the case itself, (including the remedies) will be forwarded without delay, and in such a manner as to convey no idea of the purport of the letter or parcel so transmitted.

Consultation, by letter or otherwise, FREE. Permanent cure guaranteed, or no pay. Address,

W. K. DOHERTY, M. D.

San Francisco, Cal

SPERMATORRHŒA.

DR. DOHERTY has just published an important pamphlet embodying his own views and experiences in relation to Impotence or Virility, being a short treatise on Spermatorrhœa, or Seminal Weakness, Nervous and Physical Debility consequent on this affection, and other diseases of the Sexual Organs

This little work contains information of the utmost value to all whether married or single, and will be sent FREE by mail on receipt of Six Cents in Postage stamps for return postage. Address,

FREE HOMESTEADS FOR ALL

ON FILING A PETITION.

UNDER THE LAWS OF MEXICO, which are now in force in this city, all the inhabitants are entitled to a HOMESTEAD LOT OF LAND, simply on petition. Justice Field has decided, and the Supreme Court of the United States has confirmed that decision, that the city of San Francisco is a Pueblo of four squnre leagues of land, and that the citizens thereof are the owners, which vests the right in each citizen to a lot of land for a homestead; and the undersigned have opened an office at 37 MERCHANTS' EXCHANGE, to enforce those rights, by petition to the Mayor, etc.; and each and every citizen can procure a Free Homestead by calling at their office and signing a petition, which will forthwith vest the right to the lot in question in them, and thereby secure to the petitioner property worth a large sum of money under the existing laws now in force.

BROOKS & MERRITT,

No. 37 New Merchants' Exchange.

N. B.—The Supreme Court of the United States have settled this question in another case, as to the ownership of the Outside Lands. In the case of J. B. Townsend vs. Geo. G. Greeley, December Term, 1866, No. 124, the Court say: "It is, therefore, now the settled law that the municipal lands held by the city of San Francisco, as successors to the former Pueblo existing there, are not held in absolute property, but IN TRUST for its inhabitants."

Therefore, all the inhabitants have to do, under this decision, is to ask the city, by petition, for their vested rights, as this is the only way, under the law, that they can proceed to get their property.

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.
In the matter of the estate of WILLIAM LOBB, deceased.
Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.
On reading and filing the petition of J. W. Brumagim, the Administrator of the Estate of William Lobb, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled.
It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of the said William Lobb, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall, in said city and county, on WEDNESDAY, the eleventh day of December, A. D. 1867, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the heirs of the said William Lobb, deceased, according to law:
It is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said eleventh day of December, A. D. 1867, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.
M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.
Dated November 1st, 1867.
